Mr. ALLISON. From the Committee on Appropriations, I report back with amendments the bill (H. R. 14019) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, and I also submit a brief report explaining the nature of the amendments. I desire to give notice now that at the earliest practicable moment, consistent with other pressing business of the Senate, I shall ask for the consideration of the bill. If an opportunity should occur to-morrow, I will be glad to call it up some time to-morrow. I do not wish to interfere with the necessary debate upon the canal bill, but if there should be an opportunity I shall be glad to call it up to-morrow morning.

Mr. NELSON. I trust the Senator——

Mr. ALLISON. One moment further. I ask that 500 extra copies of the bill with the amendments may be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar. The Senator from Iowa asks that 500 additional copies may be printed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AGREEMENT WITH CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIANS.

Mr. STEWART. I give notice that in case the Choctaw treaty bill is reconsidered I will offer what I send to the Chair as a substitute for section 32.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me suggest to the Senator from Nevada that we consider the vote reconsidered, so that he may offer the amendment, because I take it that he is not willing to stand on the bill in its present shape.

Mr. STEWART. No, I will not do that. I will simply have the amendment printed. It is a substitute for section 32, about which there is controversy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of section 32 of the bill (S. 4848) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians, and for other purposes, insert the following:

SEC. 32. Said citizenship court shall also have appellate jurisdiction over all judgments of the courts in Indian Territory rendered under said act of Congress of June 10, 1896, admitting persons to citizenship or to enrollment as citizens in either of said nations. The right of appeal may be exercised by the said nations jointly or by either of them acting separately at any time within six months after this agreement is finally ratified. In the exercise of such appellate jurisdiction said citizenship court shall be authorized to consider, review, and revise all such judgments, both as to findings of fact and conclusions of law, and may, wherever in its judgment substantial justice will thereby be subserved, permit either party to any such appeal to take and present such further evidence as may be necessary to enable said court to determine the very right of the controversy. And said court shall have power to make all needful rules and regulations prescribing the manner of taking and conducting said appeals and of taking additional evidence therein.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. NELSON. Is the morning business closed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is not concluded. Is there further morning business?

MAIL BOX FOR RURAL DELIVERY.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, when the Post-Office appropriation bill was under consideration I offered an amendment requiring the Postmaster-General to purchase at Government expense, and furnish, at a cost not exceeding 50 cents, a rural free-delivery mail box to those who may have use for such a box. The Senate accepted the amendment, but in the committee of conference, the House members objecting to the Senate amendment, I agreed, at the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the Senate, to the following substitute:

The Postmaster-General is hereby directed to investigate and report to Congress as soon as possible the advisability and practicability of purchasing and adopting a uniform metal lock box at a price not to exceed 50 cents, for the purpose of selling the same to patrons on rural free-delivery routes at cost.

I hold in my hand Senate Document No. 378, of this session of Congress, which is the report of the Postmaster-General upon this question in obedience to the clause of the Post-Office appropriation act which I have just read. In substance, the report goes on to show that, after due advertisement and examination by a commission appointed by the Postmaster-General, there were 12 or 14 boxes offered rather in the line of information to the Post-Office Department than as answering any bid, because the notice was given that the Postmaster-General had no authority to purchase any boxes. He had no money appropriated for that purpose, and he was merely trying to obtain the information as to whether such a box could be found or manufactured at the price named.

The 3 boxes selected out of the 14 submitted as coming nearest to the requirements of the Department were sent to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and one of them is here. [Exhibiting.] This box is offered to the Post-Office Department at 49 cents. It is made of sheet steel riveted, is a substantial and apparently durable box, has a lock which will turn anybody but a thief, and to all intents and purposes, so far as I can judge, it would answer every purpose. But the Post-Office Department objects to it, because, in the judgment of the commission, the lock is exposed to the rain and snow, and might get clogged up so that it could not be unlocked, and the sheet steel is too thin. Senators will readily observe that that could be remedied by a little flange, which could be fastened on in front, so that all I desire to call your attention to is the fact that we are in reach, or very nearly in reach, of a 50-cent box for rural free routes.

Mr. CULLOM. If the flange that you speak of is put on it will just about make it cost 50 cents.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, I do not know anything about that. I am not dealing with those special features. I am merely trying to call the attention of the Senate to three or four grave matters connected with rural delivery.

The last Post-Office appropriation bill carries nineteen and a half million dollars for free delivery in cities, and everyone who goes about two blocks on any of our streets in this city, or any other city where free delivery obtains, will see fastened to some lamp post or other post a receptacle where mail is received, and the mail carriers come around sometimes in the larger cities seven or eight times a day to gather up and deliver mail, and at least twice a day they go to every home to deliver mail; so that the denizens of the towns are receiving their mail at their doors and are enabled to deposit letters which they want to go into the mail with very little trouble or loss of time.

Now, when the rural delivery for the country people was begun I was very skeptical as to its feasibility or possibility. I thought that, owing to the scattered character of the inhabitants of the country, the farmers living segregated, it would be so costly that it would be impossible to make it self-sustaining or anywhere near self-sustaining. I am on record here as predicting that it would cost $200,000,000 to give even partial service to the farmers. I still think that if we were to reach out into the back country, into those regions which are thinly populated, to carry mail to every man in the country, or even 95 or 97 per cent of them, we would have an enormous expense. But rural delivery in the more thickly populated parts of the country has grown so much in popularity and has induced the taking of daily papers and an increase in the consumption of stamps for letter writing to a point that, having started that with very small appropriations four or five years ago, the last bill carries with it an appropriation of $7,500,000 for free rural delivery. The people of the country who have heretofore had only weekly or semiweekly or triweekly mails are now getting daily mails. I feel satisfied that there will never be any return to the old system. In other words, I stand here and assert as my belief that the free rural-delivery business will expand and grow until the appropriation will exceed that for city free delivery, and we will in time reach 95 per cent of the people of the country east of the Mississippi River and in those agricultural States west of it out of the arid region.

The present system of supplying boxes is this: Under a regulation of the Post-Office Department the patrons of the rural free-delivery routes are compelled to buy from one of fourteen manufacturers. Those manufacturers have submitted samples of their boxes, and have had them adopted. No man can receive a letter on a rural free-delivery route unless he has put up somewhere along the route a box conforming to the requirements of the Department.

Mr. GALLINGER. Can the Senator state approximately what those boxes cost?

Mr. TILLMAN. They run from $1.25 to $3. I have had letters sent to me from numerous quarters complaining of the onerous burden of being compelled to buy from this combination, or this monopoly thus created by the Post-Office Department as a wrong that ought not to be submitted to; and it was with a view to obtaining relief for the people of my country as well as others—because the most strenuous opposition to this matter came to me from New York—that I offered the amendment to the Post-Office appropriation bill requiring the Post-Office Department to buy boxes, stating that I believed they could be bought at 50 cents each, and I have here a verification of my prediction.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I was about to say that I have noticed these apparently expensive boxes along the roadside in the country towns of my own State, and it frequently occurred to me that there might be a cheaper box that would answer every purpose. I am glad the Senator has taken up the subject.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am glad to have the cooperation of the Senator from New Hampshire, and I am sure there is no Senator in this body who is not ready to cooperate if we can clearly demonstrate the feasibility and desirability of anything that will relieve the farmers of the country.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator state the character of the other two boxes he has not brought in here?

Mr. TILLMAN. One is a painted box and the other is an iron box without either paint or galvanizing.

Do not understand me as being here as the champion of this special box. I am only endeavoring to get the Senate to require the Post-Office Department to buy some box—any box—that will come up to the conditions and that can be furnished to the people cheaply.

Mr. ALLISON. It never occurred to me that the Senator was the champion of any particular box, but I understood the Senator to say that out of 14 boxes presented only 3 were sent to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. TILLMAN. As approaching the conditions required by the Department.

Mr. ALLISON. This particular box being one?

Mr. TILLMAN. This is one.

Mr. ALLISON. What were the prices of the other two?

Mr. TILLMAN. About 45, 47, or 49 cents.

Mr. ALLISON. They were all cheap boxes?

Mr. TILLMAN. All cheap boxes which come within the limit, or very near the limit. The price of this box I have here is 49 cents.

Having this matter very much at heart, I visited the Post-Office Department yesterday morning, and had a conference with the First Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Wynne, who has this matter in hand. After talking over the whole subject with him, the Department claiming that this box was made of too thin metal; in other words, that the sheet steel ought to be thicker, and that there ought to be at least some arrangement on it to shed off the water and to prevent the ice and snow from getting into the lock, and that the lock is inferior—to all of which I made no objection. Mr. Wynne wrote me at my request a letter which I have here, and which I will read and have published in the RECORD:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
OFFICE OF GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT FREE-DELIVERY SYSTEM, DIVISION OF CITY DELIVERY,
Washington, June 12, 1901.

HON. B. R. TILLMAN, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Replying to your personal request of this morning, I have the honor to transmit to you a copy of the report of the committee appointed by the Postmaster-General to report upon a plan of boxes for rural free delivery.

This report has not yet been promulgated because it was approved by the Postmaster-General about the time Congress directed him to obtain information concerning the advisability and practicability of supplying lock boxes at 50 cents each.

This report will not be promulgated until some action is taken in regard to the 50-cent box proposition. As I stated to you this morning, it is my opinion that a suitable box, including lock, can not be supplied for 50 cents. However, if Congress sees fit to raise the limit of price 15 or 20 cents and will provide the necessary appropriation to purchase boxes, this Department will promptly carry out the desire of Congress.

Very respectfully,
R. J. WYNNE,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Since talking with you, and considering the matter carefully, I have suggested an additional amount of 15 to 20 cents, instead of 10 to 15 cents, to be on the safe side.

A. W. MACHEN.

In that connection I want to call the attention of the Senate to another idea which has occurred to me in thinking over and investigating this subject, and it is this: Considering that it is settled that the rural free-delivery system is here to stay, is it not desirable, in fact, will it not in the near future become necessary that the Government itself furnish these boxes and put them at the necessary points along the routes in order to supply the demands of the patrons, and, if need be, charge a reasonable rental or let the donation go the same as it does to the people of the cities, where a carrier delivers letters to the recipient, and the mail boxes are furnished for the reception of the mail within easy reach of every citizen?

If you say that the cost of furnishing ten or twenty million boxes shall be thrown on the patrons—I can not tell how many there will be—but every free rural route will take something like 100, some more and some less, according to whether the country is thickly or thinly settled, but, on an average, I think it will take 100 boxes to every route, as I am informed by the Department that would mean doubling the cost of these boxes and furnishing a box at a cost of $1 or $1.25. You might throw the protection of the law around those boxes as the property of the United States, and they are for the use of the citizens of the United States. We already have in the Post-Office appropriation bill a punitive provision, punishing anyone for interfering with the mail in a private box. I am merely calling attention to the fact that if the Government itself shall supply these boxes, making them of such durable character that the life of the boxes will be ten, or fifteen, or twenty years, it would be an advance in the direction of economy, rather than making each individual patron buy a box from private individuals, as is now the case, at from $1.25 to $3; or if this new idea which I am advocating shall go into effect, that the individual shall buy his own box from the Government at 50 or 70 cents, according to the limitation fixed by Congress.

I am not prepared to offer anything more than these suggestions to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. I do not want to have the appearance of intermeddling with the business of that committee, but I am so much interested in this matter of furnishing boxes to the farmers at a reduction on the present exhorbitant prices that I thought it worth while to bring this matter to the attention of the Senate, with a view to asking the Post-Office Committee to take the matter up immediately and to suggest some amendment to the law, which may go on some of the appropriation bills—the Post-Office appropriation bill having gone through—to which we can attach it as an amendment, because it is doubtful whether we can get a separate individual bill through both Houses at this session. I want to ask the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to consider the matter in the light of the facts I have presented and in the light of the report of the Post-Office Department, which is here submitted and will be printed, showing they are now standing still and looking to us.

The Department in this report submits some specifications as to the boxes which can be made by anybody anywhere and sold the same as any other private manufactured article is, by merely complying with the conditions prescribed by the Government. If you will consider for a moment that if the matter is left to private parties to manufacture these boxes to sell to individuals, it involves a large army of drummers or salesmen; it involves a commission.

I have here a letter from the manufacturers of this box, which says that the cost of this box, which they offer to the Government at 49 cents in wholesale lots, carload lots, would be $1.50 to the consumer if they had to provide the machinery of the sale and distribution. They say they could not afford to sell it for less. If you will consider for a moment that by requiring the Department to ship these boxes free to distributing depots in each State, in charge of the postmaster at such point, and then distributing them through the mail cars to the initial point where the rural route is to begin, the expense could not be more than 6, or 8, or 10 cents for each box, and it is seen at once that the saving to the farmer which would follow such a system must appeal to every Senator.

I have two letters received two or three days ago from a friend in my little home town of Trenton, where two rural routes go into effect on the 1st of July. He said to me:

We have been waiting to see what is to become of your amendment. We have tentatively made a bargain for boxes to go on our route, to be purchased privately. These boxes are the best that we could get, at least the only ones we feel able to buy, and they cost $1.25 each.

You see at once that that little town, or the community around it, are now compelled to pay $150 additional expense over and above what the Government could supply these boxes to these people for if this system which I am advocating were put in force.

I will publish the letter of the Briscoe Manufacturing Company, who are the makers of the box I have exhibited to the Senate. I also ask that the report of the Post-Office Department, which accompanies the letter from Mr. Wynne, which I just read, may go into the RECORD.

The papers referred to are as follows:

BRISCOE MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
Detroit, Mich., May 24, 1902.

Hon. BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN,
Senate Annex, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request, we send to you a mail box designed for the rural delivery service, being of the same design as submitted by us to the Post-Office Department and examined by the commission which was appointed by the Postmaster-General.

This box is made of black sheet steel, and is galvanized after it is made, making it practically as of one piece, and is of such dimensions and material as a commission appointed by the Postmaster-General in March last decided, after due deliberation, was the right thing for this service.

The price we named on the heaviest box we submitted to the commission which met last week (which was, in fact, a gauge heavier than the sample we send you) was 49 cents each, crated, f. o. b. place of manufacture, or Detroit, Mich.

In response to the advertisement, there were 14 bids. We made the lowest bid on light boxes, and the only galvanized box made of such weight of material and dimensions as was recommended by the commission as suitable was presented by us.

In fact had it not been for the bid we made we feel sure that the commission recently appointed would necessarily have had to report that no suitable galvanized box had been presented, and it would, we contend, be a crime upon the patrons to sell them a box which had not been galvanized. Therefore, had it not been for our action the probability is that the status of supply of mail boxes would have remained practically as it has been during the last year.

We have always contended that the method of supplying these boxes by the manufacturers in the way that has been previously done was wrong for the following reasons:

1. It obliges the manufacturer to maintain and support an expensive selling organization.

2. It obliges the manufacturer to support a system for the distribution of the boxes after the orders are taken.

3. The manufacturers not being able to definitely know where or what the market for boxes is going to be, they are never able to manufacture with that foresight or economy that would be possible under a more definite policy.

4. There are of course numerous losses of accounts which have to be considered in the price, as also the expense of maintaining a credit system.

The box which we have offered to the Department at 49 cents each is a better box in weight, material, and workmanship than many that have been sold at from $1.50 to $2, and in fact the cost of selling and distributing is such under the present system that this same box would have to be sold for $1.50 to the farmer—that is, providing the manufacturer has to maintain the present expensive method of selling and distributing.

As to the lock on the boxes we submitted, it is thoroughly practical in our estimation. We have used it for several months on boxes that we have been selling, and it has given good satisfaction. At the same time, should the Department desire, we can work up the same material into a lock made on the same principle in any form that will be satisfactory to them. We contend that it is not necessary to have a bank lock on these boxes, as the mail remains in them but a short time, and the box is generally in plain sight of the patron at all times.

It is our opinion that if anyone intended to steal the mail from one of these boxes, or from any rural-delivery box, they would unfasten the box from the post and take along the box, mail and all, rather than take the additional time that it would require to pick or break the lock. It is our intention, however, to make the latch and wearing parts of the lock of tempered steel, in order that they may give longer service than the lock shown on sample.

We offered in our bid to furnish a bond for any amount satisfactory to the Department for faithful performance and to furnish references or a certified check as evidence of our responsibility, both financial and mechanical.

We have a complete metal-working plant, stamping works, and galvanizing works, and are perfectly responsible and able to make all the boxes that may be required for this service.

As we have gone to considerable expense and have worked hard to equip ourselves to produce this article and have shown that a satisfactory 50-cent box is possible, we think that fair play should dictate that the advertisement was intended to mean that should a satisfactory box be presented, those presenting it should have that consideration which the lowest and satisfactory bids are usually entitled to.

Yours, truly,
BRISCOE MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
Per BENJ. BRISCOE, President.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 10, 1902.

The POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

SIR: We have the honor to submit our report, in accordance with the following order:

Ordered, No. 341, That William E. Annin, special agent in charge of the western division, rural free-delivery service; W. B. Gaitree, supervisor district No. 3; Charles Lynn, supervisor district No. 4; A. W. Wills, postmaster, Nashville, Tenn., and W. H. Marigold, postmaster, Bridgeport, Conn., be, and the same hereby are, appointed a committee to meet at Washington, D. C., on April 1, 1902, to consider the question of the supply of letter boxes to be used on rural free-delivery routes, and to submit to me such recommendations as they may have to offer, more particularly in reference to following points:

First. Should the Department continue to designate boxes and require that only such boxes shall be used on rural-delivery routes?

Second. Should the Department prescribe a standard of size and shape, durability, and material of construction, and permit the erection by patrons of any box which conforms to the conditions laid down?

Third. Should the Department permit the erection by patrons of any box they may desire to select without any limitation or restriction?

All necessary expenses incurred by the committee shall be paid from the appropriation for rural free-delivery service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902.

H. C. PAYNE, Postmaster-General.

The committee met in the city of Washington April 1, and has held daily sessions since.

From the wording of the order directing them to consider the question "of the supply of letter boxes to be used on rural free-delivery routes" and to submit to yourself such recommendations as they may have to offer, the committee deem it their duty to examine carefully all boxes presented to them, and to consider their merits and demerits prior to arriving at any question of policy with reference to the three points more particularly designated in the order.

In addition to the 14 boxes designated by the prior commission, 60 were examined and considered by the committee under practically the same rules as those laid down by the commission of 1901, and presented in the report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General for the fiscal year 1901-2.

Patient hearings were given to all inventors, promoters, or representatives of manufacturers of boxes, and a large correspondence in connection with some of the samples were considered and placed on file. A list of the boxes examined is appended herewith.

Your committee, after careful consideration of the specific questions of the departmental order in connection with previous examination of individual boxes and consideration of the arguments of representatives of boxes, and aided very materially by the reports of special agents and route inspectors written in answer to the departmental circular, have unanimously reached the following conclusions:

1. That the present policy of the Department in designating individual boxes and in requiring that only such boxes shall be used on rural free-delivery routes should not continue.

2. That it will be to the best interests of the service that a standard of size, durability, and material of construction should be prescribed by the Department, and that patrons be permitted to erect any box conforming to the specifications hereinafter prescribed.

3. That the erection by patrons of any box desired, without any limitation or restriction, should not be permitted by the Department.

The existing policy of box designation by the Department, while a material advance upon the policy which permitted the erection of any receptacle for the collection and delivery of rural mail, has evidently not proved entirely satisfactory to the Department, inventors of rural free-delivery boxes, or to the patrons of rural free-delivery routes. While the greatest care was taken by the previous commission to afford wide scope in the selection of rural free-delivery boxes, both as to material and price, the limitation of boxes in number has not, unnaturally, caused dissatisfaction among those whose boxes were either rejected, or who since that time have not had the opportunity to present them for examination and approval. Patrons of routes in various parts of the country, distant from factories manufacturing the designated boxes, complain of the expense of transportation and the added cost of freight or express rates from factory to home.

It is believed by your committee, after a most careful consideration of the letters of the files of the Department from special agents and route inspectors conversant with the conditions throughout the country, that the best interests of the service will be subserved by prescribing a standard for a rural box which can be manufactured in all parts of the country, under rigid specifications providing for durability, security, and accessibility. Such a policy on the part of the Department, it is believed by your committee, will remove many of the complaints and criticisms not now infrequently heard in connection with the manufacture and sale of rural free-delivery boxes. A healthful competition will be everywhere stimulated. Patrons of routes will be given a wide choice of boxes, which will meet the requirements of the service and which can be selected according to the taste and means of the purchaser. The possibility of combinations of manufacturers in maintaining prices and dividing territory will be absolutely obviated, and the complaints of the difficulty in obtaining boxes ordered from factories in time for installation on routes far distant will cease.

The committee had before it several experts in the manufacture of metals, and their testimony aided materially in the drafting of specifications with regard to the proposed standard.

The committee found it inadvisable to recommend any particular devices or inventions as auxiliaries of boxes, many of which presented were most ingenious, and reached the conclusion that such devices in connection with signals and locks should be left to the choice of patrons of rural routes selecting boxes upon which the same were employed.

SPECIFICATIONS.

All square or oblong boxes shall be made of not less than 20 standard gauge sheet iron or sheet steel, and galvanized, the edges of which shall be supported or strengthened either by folding the metal back upon itself or by riveting to the edges band iron or steel at least one-sixteenth inch in thickness and at least one-half inch in width, or by wiring with at least No. 10 gauge wire; provided, if a box be made of a heavier material than 20 gauge, the above requirements as to reinforcements need not be observed.

Circular, semicircular, or rounding boxes shall be made of not less than 22-gauge iron or steel; provided, however, that should boxes be made of black iron or steel, and galvanized after they are made, they shall not be made of lighter than 24 gauge. Circular, semicircular, or rounding boxes shall have the openings made so that there shall be no unsupported edges; and edges must be strengthened by either corrugating, bending, curling, or wiring with No. 10 gauge wire, or by folding the metal back upon itself, or by supporting by riveting to such edges band iron at least one-sixteenth inch in thickness and at least one-half inch in width.

WORKMANSHIP.

All boxes must be made in the best workmanlike manner, and there must be no joints depending solely on solder to hold the different parts of the box together, but all joints must be either seamed, curled, or riveted. Covers, lids, or encasements shall be hinged or pivoted in a strong, substantial manner, and edges of same shall extend down or lap over the mail-holding compartment for a sufficient distance, so that when closed it will thoroughly protect the mail from rain, snow, or dust under all circumstances. All exposed parts, such as rivets and hinges, must be galvanized.

SIZE.

The dimensions of rural free-delivery boxes shall be, if a square or rectangular box, not less than 18 by 6 by 6 inches; if cylindrical, not less than 18 inches long and 6 inches in diameter, the capacity to be not less than 488 cubic inches.

ACCESSIBILITY.

Experience has shown that boxes of side or top openings character are more readily accessible than end-opening boxes, and that end-opening boxes are not desirable.

INSPECTION.

Individuals or firms who propose to manufacture rural mail boxes shall submit a sample of the box or boxes, together with a sample of the material of which the box is to be composed, to the special agent in charge of the division in whose territory he may reside, and in whose territory the factory may be located, for inspection and approval. If said box or boxes shall be found to conform to the requirements and specifications of the Department, the manufacturer shall be directed to stencil in a conspicuous place on the said box or boxes the words, "Approved by the Post-Office Department," and the date of such approval.

If upon a route inspection of said box or boxes it shall appear that a box or boxes have been erected that do not conform to the standard as approved by the Department, such box or boxes shall be condemned and shall be replaced at the expense of the manufacturer with a standard box, and without cost to the patrons; and the manufacturer shall be notified to supply the additional box or boxes without cost to the patrons. Upon failure to comply with this requirement, the approval of the Department for said box or boxes shall be withdrawn.

No rural carrier shall deliver mail into or take mail from any box erected after the 1st of July, 1902, on the line of his route that has not been officially approved by the Post-Office Department.

No box of whatever shape shall be painted until after the inspection of sample box at division headquarters, and all boxes of whatever character must be absolutely secure against the weather.

GENERAL RECOMMENDATIONS.

We respectfully recommend that the order promulgated by the Postmaster-General prohibiting postmasters and carriers from acting as agents for the sale and distribution of rural mail boxes be rescinded, experience having shown that the best results have been obtained on routes wherein the postmaster and carriers have cooperated in the equipment of the routes.

Whatever the character of the box erected, it is of the highest importance that it be properly installed on the route. Reports of route inspectors have shown almost uniform carelessness throughout the country in the location of boxes, which, in many instances, are so placed as to delay the carrier in his work and to prevent easy access to their contents. As a condition precedent to the collection and delivery of mail on a rural route the box should be so placed as to be accessibe to the carrier without dismounting from his vehicle.

After investigation of the question of the protection thrown around rural mail boxes by the operation of departmental order, and after consultation with the law officers of the Department, it was deemed advisable by the committee to call upon the Postmaster-General, and through him upon the Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department, to draft an amendment to the pending Post-Office appropriation bill, giving statutory protection to rural mail boxes erected under the designation and approval of the Department, and protection to the life and person of the carrier while engaged on his route in the discharge of his duty.

A constant cause of friction and complaint in the installation and inspection of rural routes has been found in the difficulty often experienced in securing qualified officers for the administration of oaths. It was deemed advisable, therefore, to recommend an amendment to that effect, which was drafted and laid before the Post-Office Committee of the Senate, that hereafter special agents, route inspectors, and examining inspectors in the rural free-delivery service shall be authorized and empowered to administer oaths to carriers and other persons employed in said service, or in connection with any business relating to the same. The incorporation of this suggestion into law will relieve carriers selected and bonded from charges of jurat fees, and will also greatly facilitate the work of special agents, route inspectors, and examining inspectors.

Owing to numerous complaints that the discontinuance of fourth-class offices, postmasters of which under the law are empowered to administer oaths required to be made by pensioners and their witnesses in connection with pension vouchers, had caused in instances great inconvenience to pensioners on rural routes living at considerable distances from an officer qualified to administer an oath, it was deemed advisable to recommend an amendment to the post-office bill, empowering rural carriers to administer any and all such oaths in connection with the execution of pension vouchers.

An amendment covering the above-named points was drafted by the Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department, and submitted to the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, a copy of which amendment is hereto appended.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr. NELSON. I call for the regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and the Senate to the recommendation of the Postmaster-General upon this subject. The following provision was contained in the Post-Office appropriation bill for the coming fiscal year:

The Postmaster-General is hereby directed to investigate and report to Congress as soon as possible the advisability and practicability of purchasing and adopting a uniform metal lock box at a price not to exceed 50 cents, for the purpose of selling the same to patrons on rural free-delivery routes at cost.

That was offered as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

This is a new enterprise in this country, and of course all new things have to take their opportunity for growth by experience. The Postmaster-General, having invited bids under that provision of the law and after an examination of the sample boxes sent to him, makes this report:

I respectfully submit that the rural free-delivery service, which has now so far developed that there will be on the 1st of July, 1902, between nine and ten thousand rural routes in existence, each route requiring on an average nearly 100 rural boxes, will be better advanced by placing this service on a high level and requiring a durable and suitable box at a low cost, which can be obtained by general competition such as provided in this report rather than by the Government undertaking to purchase a cheap, insecure, and unsuitable box to distribute to patrons at cost.

The Postmaster-General also says:

I venture to suggest to the Congress that the bids submitted in response to the advertisement above referred to were very generally based upon an understanding that the Department would order at least 1,000,000 boxes to commence with. This would require an immediate appropriation by Congress of $500,000, and probably an equal amount would have to be appropriated for the cost of transportation from the places of manufacture to the offices of the postmasters by whom these boxes would be distributed to the patrons, and who would be expected to collect from them the cost.

Mr. President, competition is the order of the day; it is competition against cooperation, and this is one of the questions that the Senator from South Carolina delights to discuss. The great danger is in allowing one manufacturer to absolutely monopolize this business, to have the Government itself undertake to furnish boxes, something which they have done in the cities. The Senator very properly calls attention to the fact that we have letter boxes in which to deposit the letters we send, but if anyone living in a city desires a box at his residence for his private use to receive his mail he must purchase one of his own.

On this proposition I think the Postmaster-General is doing very well. The Department when this service began limited it to three different boxes. Other people then began to manufacture. I believe in the State of Illinois alone there are three or four different people who manufacture these letter boxes. They want a chance to furnish and sell these boxes to the people.

It seems to me that the Postmaster-General, upon reflection, will simply say that the boxes shall be of certain dimensions and of a certain quality, and then there will be no hardship if all the manufacturers of the United States are permitted to compete in the customary manner.

A man manufacturing in South Carolina can sell to the people there better than he could sell to those in Illinois. He would have the advantage of transportation as against the cost of transportation on boxes that would be sent to South Carolina by manufacturers in Illinois; and so with the manufacturer in Illinois in furnishing boxes for that State as against the South Carolina manufacturer.

There is no bill now, so far as I know, on which an amendment of this character can be placed to make the appropriation for this year. I am willing, so far as I am concerned as chairman of the committee, to offer every opportunity to the Senator if he can show any better plan than that presented by the Postmaster-General. I shall be very glad to introduce, or, if the Senator will introduce, I shall be glad to support such a bill as he desires; but I do not think that at the present time we can drive the manufacturers out of business, except we were to say that we would make an absolute monopoly, so that all these middlemen we are talking about, these agents who get commissions, shall be dispensed with; that we will drive them all out of business and afford one man an opportunity to manufacture these boxes; that the Government, in order to drive them all out of business, shall use its power to buy and to sell at cost.

As to the first boxes put out I heard a great deal of complaint; but now if you attempt to establish a free rural-delivery route, I am told by the people that you will receive printed circulars describing the boxes of at least from 14 to 20 different manufacturers offering their boxes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] did not listen to me closely, or he would have heard, I think, because I certainly intended to say it if I did not, that the paper which I presented from the Post-Office Department contained the very recommendation of which the Senator now speaks. In other words, that the Post-Office Department, unless Congress shall instruct it to do otherwise, is providing, in an order which is already drawn up, but not yet promulgated, that there shall be a specified box, a box corresponding to certain specifications and dimensions, to be made anywhere by anybody, and sold to any one where the box is required to be used on free rural routes.

Mr. MASON. What is the objection to that?

Mr. TILLMAN. The objection is this, that in at least half of the States of this Union there are no manufacturers who can manufacture these boxes cheaply, and the people of those States will have to pay the additional expense involved in the transportation from the manufacturing centers in the North and East, where these boxes can be manufactured cheaply, to the remote regions, as well as a commission on them; whereas the United States can distribute them at a cost of not exceeding 10 or 15 cents per box, and we have from these very manufacturers, whose box

I have exhibited here, a statement that they can not afford to sell these boxes privately for less than $1.50. There is the difference. I am in favor of saving that. Take my community, where there are 200 boxes to be put up in the next two weeks, and $250 is going out from those people to be paid for the boxes they will need. The Government could, under the scheme I am advocating, supply these at $100, or at most $140, and save those people the difference while supplying a better and more desirable box.

The ones to be bought will be rotten or rusted out in three or four years, whereas the Government could supply a substantial box at the cost it has been shown it can be done at, not exceeding 70 cents; and the First Assistant Postmaster-General, who is in charge of this special work, has written me to that effect. He recommends it. The Postmaster-General is obliged to depend upon his subordinates and lieutenants to make recommendations. He merely signs these reports which are sent up to him from below as the action of the Department, but he is responsible for them; and, knowing that his subordinates have dealt with him with absolute fairness and have done what they thought best, he adopts their views. Why shall not the Government supply these boxes at cost the same as it supplies stamps and other post-office supplies?

I am not so much in favor of paternalism—and the Senator had to drag that in as a kind of side-wipe at me because I am a little unorthodox upon some things—but I am for the paternalism that deals with absolute impartiality with all the people of the country; which does not take money out of one man's pocket and put it into another man's pocket under special legislation. That is the kind of paternalism I am objecting to.

I have presented the proposition—and the Department recommended it—that if we will let them have an appropriation with which to begin business, they will supply boxes of a substantial and proper character, with a good lock, at not exceeding 70 cents, made by some of these 12 or 15 manufacturers; and if it is not done some fifteen or twenty million farmers are going to be mulcted to pay for these boxes under private competition and the cost of distribution. I do not know how many million dollars will be saved to these people by the plan I propose. Why should we not have the Government adopt the scheme? Suppose somebody comes along and offers to supply these boxes for 40 cents or 30 cents, why not let the Government accept that offer? I do not see why we should create a monopoly and not have open competition. You merely specify that you want a box with a certain thickness of steel, that you want it well made, you want it of certain dimensions, you want it galvanized and with a good lock, and if one man can manufacture a box cheaper than another, let him get the job. That is my contention.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. Before I leave the subject, if the Senator from New Hamsphire will pardon me a moment——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This debate is proceeding by unanimous consent. It does not come under the head of morning business.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understand that, Mr. President, but I am sure that no one will object to my asking the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] whether or not he is willing to have some amendment, which will provide for the money necessary to set this business in motion, to go either on the deficiency bill or some other appropriation bill with which he has to deal. I understood him as being friendly to this idea; and if the plan I propose is shown to be practicable and desirable, I trust he will consent that it may go upon some appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I am friendly to the general idea of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], which is that the cheapest and most useful boxes shall be supplied on the rural free-delivery routes of our country, and that the necessary legislation be provided, if further legislation be needed on this subject, as I understand from the Senator it is. I am not, however, now prepared to say that I would be in favor of the Government of the United States buying these boxes and distributing them, although the arguments of the Senator are very persuasive in that direction. What I meant to say to him was that in a matter of so much importance, as this seems to be, by unanimous consent of the Senate a provision might be inserted upon some appropriation bill, if there is any difficulty in passing a separate measure.

The Postmaster-General appears to suggest an appropriation for this purpose. I should think that even that would not be necessary, as we have already appropriated, as I understand, a large sum for rural free delivery, and it could easily be provided, if the ideas of the Senator from South Carolina shall prevail in the Senate, that so much of that appropriation as might be necessary should be applied to rural free-delivery boxes.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to ask right there if the Senator will give us his opinion as to whether it will not be permissible to allow the Postmaster-General to use some of the funds at his disposal, just merely as a loan, for as soon as the boxes are manufactured and distributed, the money comes right back and goes into the post-office fund, and the Government is not out a nickel?

Mr. ALLISON. I understand. Just one word more, Mr. President. We have a Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads—one of the most eminent committees of this body—which is charged with this subject, and I should think that that committee would deal with it, if it be necessary to deal with it, in order to meet some of the difficulties that have been discovered during the session of Congress. I do not wish to enter into any arrangement that would interfere with the mature consideration and deliberation of that committee upon the subject.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was not for a moment endeavoring to trap the Senator from Iowa or trying to get him to make any promise. I was merely asking whether or not, if the Post-Office Committee came in here with some recommendation involving new legislation, that the point of order would not be made by him, and that other things being equal, if the plan was practicable and desirable, he would not make the point of order, but that he would support the proposition with his vote. That is about what I understood was the Senator's position on this subject. Neither he nor I want to attempt to bulldoze or to press unduly the Post-Office Committee in this matter. I have simply been interested in it because of the fact that the people of my country are very poor and many of them have written to me asking whether or not they are going to be allowed to buy these boxes from the Government at this reduced price. It can be readily seen that it will be a great saving to the farmers throughout the country if this thing is done. That is the reason why I press the Post-Office Committee to take the question up. If they do not see proper to move in the matter, I shall not press it any further at this session. The matter has been presented in so clear and convincing a light that no fair-minded man can refuse to consider it. I sincerely trust the Post-Office Committee will take the matter under consideration and promptly report something that will give relief.

DISTRICT TELEPHONE SERVICE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, pursuant to previous notice, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12865) regulating the use of telephone wires in the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, this bill is far-reaching in its consequences. It really gives to one corporation the privilege to use the entire District for telephone purposes. That may be right. I do not believe that more than one company can successfully operate here. I do not believe any other company can be organized. But Congress having taken that position, it assumes the responsibility to see to it that the charges are reasonable. There has been a good deal of controversy about reasonable charges in this connection. While I shall not oppose the passage of the bill, I wish to give notice now that at the commencement of the next session I shall offer a resolution requiring the Committee on the District of Columbia to make a thorough investigation as to telephone charges and to recommend such modifications of the law, if they shall be necessary, as will result in furnishing telephone service in the District at reasonable rates. That responsibility rests absolutely upon Congress when it gives the entire District to one company.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from Nevada says he will offer a resolution to direct the Committee on the District of Columbia to make a thorough investigation as to the question of rates. That question does not arise in this bill at all. I will say to the Senator that a gentleman representing the Chesapeake and Potomac Telephone Company, knowing I had reported this bill, called on me three days ago, requesting me to do that very thing, saying that the company wished it done. I assure the Senator that if he will move in the matter at the beginning of the next session a thorough investigation will be made.

Mr. President, the committee have reported three or four inconsequential amendments, which I now ask may be disagreed to. This is a House bill, and I think it desirable not to amend it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the amendments reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia be disagreed to. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendments are disagreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 11742) granting certain lots in Gnadenhutten, Ohio, to Gnadenhutten special school district was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to give notice that on Tuesday next, upon the calling up of the Isthmian Canal bill, I will take the floor to make some remarks upon it.

MORIARTY SUBMARINE BOAT.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the statements before the Committees on Naval Affairs of the Senate and House of Representatives of Clarence W. De Knight, counsel, and Thomas J. Moriarty, president of the Newport Manufacturing Company and inventor of the Moriarty submarine boat, be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

AGREEMENT WITH CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIANS.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning, immediately after the routine business, I will call up the Choctaw agreement and attempt to have it disposed of. It has been hanging along. I wish to give the notice now, so that I may be recognized to move to take it up after the routine business to-morrow is disposed of.

LONDON DOCK CHARGES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1792) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to navigation of vessels, bills of lading, and to certain obligations, duties, and rights in connection with the carriage of property."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. NELSON. Two amendments were offered by the Senator from Maine. One was offered last Saturday. There was a vote on it, but it was not disposed of. I have sent for the Senator from Maine.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What is the pending amendment? Let it be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is endeavoring to find out.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. When the Chair succeeds in his undertaking I hope it may be reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine offered a substitute for the bill, but before the substitute was offered he submitted an amendment to the text, and of course the amendment of the text has precedence. The clerks do not seem to be able to find the first amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to move an amendment to the text. If it is not in order now, I will give notice of my intention to offer it, and let it be printed. It is to add at the end of the original bill what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall prevent the carrier from stipulating for the reimbursement to him by the shipper or consignee of any charges which he may be lawfully compelled to pay or for compensation for any service which he may agree to render.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. PROCTOR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirty-seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH CUBA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States; which was read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I deem it important before the adjournment of the present session of Congress to call attention to the following expressions in the message which in the discharge of the duty imposed upon me by the Constitution I sent to Congress on the first Tuesday of December last:

"Elsewhere I have discussed the question of reciprocity. In the case of Cuba, however, there are weighty reasons of morality and of national interest why the policy should be held to have a peculiar application, and I most earnestly ask your attention to the wisdom, indeed, to the vital need, of providing for a substantial reduction in the tariff duties on Cuban imports into the United States. Cuba has in her constitution affirmed what we desired, that she should stand, in international matters, in closer and more friendly relations with us than with any other power; and we are bound by every consideration of honor and expediency to pass commercial measures in the interest of her material well-being."

This recommendation was merely giving practical effect to President McKinley's words when, in his messages of December 5, 1898, and December 5, 1899, he wrote:

"It is important that our relations with this people [of Cuba] shall be of the most friendly character and our commercial relations close and reciprocal. * * * We have accepted a trust, the fulfillment of which calls for the sternest integrity of purpose and the exercise of the highest wisdom. The new Cuba yet to arise from the ashes of the past must needs be bound to us by ties of singular intimacy and strength if its enduring welfare is to be assured. * * * The greatest blessing which can come to Cuba is the restoration of her agricultural and industrial prosperity."

Yesterday, June 12, I received by cable from the American minister in Cuba a most earnest appeal from President Palma for "legislative relief before it is too late and [his] country financially ruined."

The granting of reciprocity with Cuba is a proposition which stands entirely alone. The reasons for it far outweigh those for granting reciprocity with any other nation, and are entirely consistent with preserving intact the protective system under which this country has thriven so marvelously. The present tariff law was designed to promote the adoption of such a reciprocity treaty, and expressly provided for a reduction not to exceed 20 per cent upon goods coming from a particular country, leaving the tariff rates on the same articles unchanged as regards all other countries. Objection has been made to the granting of the reduction on the ground that the substantial benefit would not go to the agricultural producer of sugar, but would inure to the American sugar refiners. In my judgment provision can and should be made which will guarantee us against this possibility without having recourse to a measure of doubtful policy, such as a bounty in the form of a rebate.

The question as to which, if any, of the different schedules of the tariff ought most properly to be revised does not enter into this matter in any way or shape. We are concerned with getting a friendly reciprocal arrangement with Cuba. This arrangement applies to all the articles that Cuba grows or produces. It is not in our power to determine what these articles shall be, and any discussion of the tariff as it affects special schedules or countries other than Cuba is wholly aside from the subject-matter to which I call your attention.

Some of our citizens oppose the lowering of the tariff on Cuban products, just as three years ago they opposed the admission of the Hawaiian Islands, lest free trade with them might ruin certain of our interests here. In the actual event their fears proved baseless as regards Hawaii, and their apprehensions as to the damage to any industry of our own because of the proposed measure of reciprocity with Cuba seems to me equally baseless. In my judgment no American industry will be hurt, and many American industries will be benefited by the proposed action. It is to our advantage, as a nation, that the growing Cuban market should be controlled by American producers.

The events following the war with Spain and the prospective building of the isthmian canal render it certain that we must take, in the future, a far greater interest than hitherto in what happens throughout the West Indies, Central America, and the adjacent coasts and waters. We expect Cuba to treat us on an exceptional footing politically, and we should put her in the same exceptional position economically. The proposed action is in line with the course we have pursued as regards all the islands with which we have been brought into relations of varying intimacy by the Spanish war. Porto Rico and Hawaii have been included within our tariff lines, to their great benefit as well as ours, and without any of the feared detriment to our own industries. The Philippines, which stand in a different relation, have been given substantial tariff concessions.

Cuba is an independent Republic, but a Republic which has assumed certain special obligations as regards her international position in compliance with our request. I ask for her certain special economic concessions in return; these economic concessions to benefit us as well as her. There are few brighter pages in American history than the page which tells of our dealings with Cuba during the past four years. On her behalf we waged a war of which the mainspring was generous indignation against oppression, and we have kept faith absolutely. It is earnestly to be hoped that we will complete, in the same spirit, the record so well begun, and show in our dealings with Cuba that steady continuity of policy which it is essential for our nation to establish in foreign affairs if we desire to play well our part as a world-power.

We are a wealthy and powerful nation; Cuba is a young Republic, still weak, who owes to us her birth; whose whole future, whose very life, must depend on our attitude toward her. I ask that we help her as she struggles upward along the painful and difficult road of self-governing independence. I ask this aid for her because she is weak, because she needs it, because we have already aided her. I ask that open-handed help of a kind which a self-respecting people can accept be given to Cuba for the very reason that we have given her such help in the past. Our soldiers fought to give her freedom, and for three years our representatives, civil and military, have toiled unceasingly, facing disease of a peculiarly sinister and fatal type with patient and uncomplaining fortitude, to teach her how to use aright her new freedom. Never in history has any alien country been thus administered with such high integrity of purpose, such wise judgment, and such single-minded devotion to the country's interests. Now I ask that the Cubans be given all possible chance to use to the best advantage the freedom of which Americans have such right to be proud and for which so many American lives have been sacrificed.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, June 13, 1902.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message will be printed and referred to the Committee on Relations with Cuba.

Mr. BAILEY. Is it in order to make a motion for the reference of the message?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. BAILEY. I believe I will not do it, but I feel inclined to move to refer the message to the Republican caucus. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not aware that there is any Senate committee of that name.

LOUISIANA PURCHASE EXPOSITION COMPANY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Industrial Expositions, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State covering a statement showing the receipts and disbursements of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Company for the month of April, 1902, furnished by the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Commission, in pursuance of section 11 of the "act to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the purchase of the Louisiana Territory," etc., approved March 3, 1901.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, June 13, 1902.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and forty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to give notice that to-morrow morning, after the routine morning business, I shall ask the Senate to consider the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was reported by me to-day from the Committee on Appropriations.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I give notice that on Monday next at 2 o'clock I shall ask leave of the Senate to submit some remarks on the bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to give notice that some time on Monday or Tuesday of next week I shall submit some remarks on the bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

AGREEMENT WITH CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIANS.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask unanimous consent that the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 4848) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians, and for other purposes, was passed, shall be taken up for consideration during the morning hour on Friday, June 20, 1902, and that it shall not interfere with the consideration of appropriation bills or the bill commonly known as the London dock clause bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent that the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indian treaty bill was passed be taken up for consideration during the morning hour on Friday of next week, not to interfere with appropriation bills or the bill known as the London dock clause bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, June 14, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate June 13, 1902.

John M. Benedict, to be postmaster at Centralia, in the county of Lewis and State of Washington, in place of John M. Benedict. Incumbent's commission expired May 5, 1902.

Charles A. Long, to be postmaster at North Bend, in the county of Dodge and State of Nebraska, in place of Charles A. Long. Incumbent's commission expired May 17, 1901.

Mary E. Bell, to be postmaster at Portland, in the county of Middlesex and State of Connecticut, in place of George C. Bell, deceased.

Gould D. Jelliffe, to be postmaster at Saugatuck, in the county of Fairfield and State of Connecticut, in place of Hiram Jelliffe, deceased.

George Y. Walbright, to be postmaster at Stroud, in the county of Lincoln and Territory of Oklahoma, in place of Isaac W. Rush, resigned.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate June 13, 1902.

MARSHAL.

Thomas B. Reid, of Wisconsin, to be United States marshal for the eastern district of Wisconsin.

POSTMASTER.

T. B. Olshausen, to be postmaster at El Paso, in the county of El Paso and State of Texas.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 13, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

WILLIAM C. HICKOX.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 4103) granting a pension to William C. Hickox, and I ask that the reading of the report be omitted, and the statement only be read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, this course will be pursued.

There was no objection.

[The report will be found in the Senate proceedings of June 9.]

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

The bill (H. R. 4103) granting a pension to William C. Hickox passed the House at $24. The Senate amended the same by striking out $24 and inserting $12.

The result of the conference is that the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agrees to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed by the Senate insert "sixteen."

C. A. SULLOWAY,
S. W. SMITH,
J. A. NORTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SULLOWAY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

HENRY I. SMITH.

Mr. RUMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 8794) granting an increase of pension to Henry I. Smith, and I ask that the reading of the report be omitted and that the statement only be read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, this course will be pursued.

There was no objection.

The report of the committee of conference is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8794) granting an increase of pension to Henry I. Smith, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by the Senate insert "forty."

J. N. W. RUMPLE,
ELIAS DEEMER,
Managers on the part of the House.

A. G. FOSTER,
J. R. BURTON,
E. W. CARMACK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

The bill (H. R. 8794) granting an increase of pension to Henry I. Smith passed the House at $60. The Senate amended by striking out $60 and inserting $30.

The result of the conference is that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by the Senate insert "forty."

J. N. W. RUMPLE,
ELIAS DEEMER,
Managers on the part of the House.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RUMPLE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

IRRIGATION OF ARID LANDS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, under the rule adopted yesterday, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Senate bill 3057.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. TAWNEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Senate bill 3057. Under the order of the House the Clerk will proceed to read the bill by sections.

The Clerk read the first section as follows:

That all moneys received from the sale and disposal of public lands in Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Kansas, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming, beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, including the surplus of fees and commissions in excess of allowances to registers and receivers, and excepting the 5 per cent of the proceeds of the sales of public lands in the above States set aside by law for educational and other purposes, shall be, and the same are hereby, reserved, set aside, and appropriated as a special fund in the Treasury to be known as the "reclamation fund," to be used in the examination and survey for and the construction and maintenance of irrigation works for the storage, diversion, and development of waters for the reclamation of arid and semiarid lands in the said States and Territories, and for the payment of all other expenditures provided for in this act: Provided, That in case the receipts from the sale and disposal of lands referred to in this section are insufficient to meet the requirements for the support of agricultural colleges in the several States and Territories, under the act of August 30, 1890, entitled "An act to apply a portion of the proceeds of the public lands to the more complete endowment and support of the colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, established under the provisions of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862," the deficiency, if any, in the sum necessary for the support of the said colleges shall be provided for from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Page 2, strike out lines 8 to 20 inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"But no part of the proceeds of sales of public lands required to carry into full effect the provisions of the act of August 30, 1890, entitled 'An act to apply a portion of the proceeds of the public lands to the more complete endowment and support of the colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts established under the provisions of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862,' shall be so set apart or diverted to such irrigation fund."

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to address the committee for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to be allowed to address the committee for ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the provisions in the bill to which my amendment is aimed points out to the committee the fact that this bill proposes not only, in my judgment, a great national wrong to be perpetrated on the farming community of the entire United States, but it proposes, in addition to that, to undermine and destroy the value of the provision made by the act of 1862 for the establishment of what was called agricultural colleges in the various States of the Union. Members of the House of Representatives may as well understand that if they pass this bill not only will they do a wrong, which I will intimate later on, in regard to the great farming interests of the United States, but they will destroy or paralyze, or substantially render nugatory, the appropriations by Congress for the agricultural colleges for all the States of the Union.

Here is a direct draft made by the railroads on the only resource of these colleges to put into a mortgage in perpetual recurrence of each year the proceeds of the sales of the public land from which hitherto the agricultural colleges have received their support, not only through annual appropriation made directly, but through the support of experimental stations which we all understand.

Now, it may be said that there is a provision in this language which I propose to strike out that if the proceeds of the sales of public lands are not sufficient, then the agricultural colleges shall be supported out of the Treasury of the United States. That, therefore, is equivalent to putting an appropriation for this irrigation purpose indirectly and immediately as a permanent annual charge on the Treasury of the United States, and it is without any limitation of amount, without any estimate of how much it will cost, without any limitation of when it shall cease, and it is simply prying open the door of the Treasury of the United States and the insertion of a crowbar that prevents it ever being closed against this claim. I will not pursue this branch of the question any further, but I wish to take as my text a single paragraph of a circular letter sent out by the farmers of the East, and I commend the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TIRRELL] to study the agricultural interests of the section of the country he represents. This is dated at Ithaca, N. Y., and is the result of the concurrent action of the farmers of the Eastern States:

There has never been during the history of the United States a question before Congress so detrimental to the interests of agriculture in general—so degrading to farming as a business—as the irrigation scheme now contemplated at Washington. It is proposed to irrigate vast tracts of Western land at the expense of the Government, thus adding to the public domain millions of acres of high class farming lands, to be given away to foreigners and others under the homestead act.

Mr. Chairman, the people of the United States gave to actual settlers and as a subsidy to the great transcontinental railroad lines a vast empire of public lands. While the farmers of the East, while the farmers of the great Middle States, while the farmers in every State westward to the Missouri River were honestly plodding under adverse circumstances and buying the land upon which they were operating, the Government was giving away this vast territory to actual settlers in furtherance of the great republican idea of establishing cities and towns and States away out on the public lands.

It is said now that a vast quantity of that land is not as good as it was supposed it might be—not even fit to be a gift from the people of the United States to the people who have settled out there. Now, what is this proposition in concrete? It is to make those lands become the invincible competitor of the farmers of Illinois, of Indiana, of a large part of Kansas, and all the way east of that part of the Union—their invincible and unconquerable competitor because of the fertility that is to be added to their soil.

And how is that to be done? It is to be done by going back to the people who gave away that land in common with the people of the whole country and compelling them by a system which I believe to be scarcely understood by a majority of the people of the country—compelling them now to create a competition with the farms that people on this side of the Missouri River have bought and paid for that will at once lesson the value of these lands and largely enhance the value of the other lands.

No wonder that these great railroad lines are here in mighty force to carry this measure through, for millions of acres of this land are still owned by the railroad companies. It was given to them as an absolute gift, for there was not one of them that ever expended a dollar of money in set-off against a subsidy of the public lands that was given to these transcontinental railroads of the United States. And now they come and say, "You have given us this land; you have given us this subsidy of money; now put four, five, or six times the value into that land by taxing the people of this country for the money to do it indirectly, and then we will show you a competition, such as the eloquent gentleman from Nebraska described last night, that will crush the farming industry of the entire great central West and East."

I have no objection to the growth of the West; I glory in it.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Can the gentleman state the number of acres now owned by railroads and other corporations?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can not; but it is a vast quantity. It ought to be easily ascertainable; and I wish I had the information at hand.

It is safe to say that the passage of this bill and the execution of this law will increase those railroad lands to four times their present value. And for what; and why? Some gentlemen stand on this floor occasionally and talk about an "infant industry" of beet sugar. If this scheme can be carried into practical operation I would not give 5 cents on the dollar ten years hence for all the beet-sugar stock this side of the Missouri River. What is the evidence that has been taken this year before the Committee on Ways and Means? Why, sir, the evidence is that the beet-sugar men of Utah and California and Colorado can manufacture beet sugar to-day almost a cent a pound cheaper than can be done without the application of irrigation.

Mr. TONGUE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. TONGUE. We are, I believe, paying about $100,000,000 (are we not?) annually to foreign nations for sugar. Now, do I understand that the gentleman from Ohio would regard it as a great calamity if we should be able to produce that sugar in what is now the arid region of the United States, on land that is now worthless?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have no objection to it. I would uphold the interests of sugar, and I would not vote to take the differential duty off refined sugar for the purpose of destroying the beet industry of the United States either, and I did not do it. I hope the time will come when we can produce $100,000,000 worth of sugar and go into the export business. But I am not willing to tax the farmers of my district and my State to take these railroad lands and all these lands and convert them into sugar-producing lands.

I add the following:

IRRIGATION SCHEMES OF THE WEST.

[By Gilbert M. Tucker, editor of the Country Gentleman. Read before the annual meeting of the New York State Farmers' Congress, at Albany, in February, 1900, and published in the annual report of the New York State Agricultural Society for the same year.]

The fact that innumerable bills having for their object the irrigation of Western lands at the expense of the Government are now before Congress is responsible for the republication of this paper, which presents strong and convincing arguments against the Government's carrying out any such line of policy. As a United States legislator you will be called on to consider these unjust and abominable measures, and you are asked to peruse this article carefully and to weigh the arguments presented in an impartial and unprejudiced manner before casting your vote.

When a dog is about to lie for a nap, you will notice that he is very apt first to go through a perfectly useless and seemingly unmeaning performance hardly in character with his wonderful sagacity, which so closely approximates the intelligence of man. He turns round and round two or three times in a little circle, his head about touching his tail. Why does he do it? Simply because his savage ancestors, thousands of years ago, living in forests undergrown with brush and weeds, noticed that they were more comfortable in their hours of repose if they first constructed in this manner a rough nest or bed. The turning round was to level the plant growth and smooth it down into a sort of mattress.

What was at first a perfectly reasonable and commendable procedure, taken under the guidance of something very closely resembling intelligent thought, came in time to be instinctive—that is to say, it was and is performed under an unthinking impulse; and the instinct became ultimately so fixed in the race, so runs in the doggish blood, one may say, that it dominates the actions of the remote descendants of those early canine creatures to-day. The dog continues to perform, without necessity, sense, or purpose, on a soft carpet or smooth wooden floor the operation which his far-away ancestors performed with very good reason in the rank undergrowth of their native forests. The practice goes right on, centuries after changing circumstances have utterly destroyed its original value.

Similar occurrences of the persistence of superannuated practices are very frequent through the whole domain of animal life; and man is not exempt. Many ideas and beliefs once sound continue to influence human life long after they have entirely lost all application and fitness to a later environment, and have therefore become at least useless, in many cases positively detrimental to posterity.

Such ideas and beliefs, inherited from past generations and still cherished, without reflection or consideration of altered circumstances, dictate to a lamentable extent the policy that governs in our time the management of the public domain, still the property of the people.

Time was, say a couple of centuries ago, or even not quite so far back as that, if you like, when every foot of extension of the civilized occupation of this country back into the wild interior, every increase in population not positively vicious, was in many ways a real and solid gain to the people of the American provinces. Occupying as our forefathers did but a narrow strip of land along the Atlantic coast, with only inchoate manufactures, very slow and uncertain communication between different sections, and agriculture not much more than adequate to provide for very modest living, the one thing that was wanted before all others was development of the nation. The father of a large family of stalwart sons and daughters was most distinctly a public benefactor.

As the children moved westward, bringing into cultivation acre after acre of new soil, and thus supplying better and better the needs of a growing population and enlarging the material resources of the common stock, they were laying broad and deep the foundations of the future greatness of the nation, and every pioneer deserved a godspeed from all well-wishers for mankind. If any central authority had at that period exercised effective control over the unoccupied lands that stretched off, seemingly without limit, to the west, it could not possibly have done a better thing for all concerned than to facilitate by every means within its power the taking up of these lands as fast as possible by anybody who could be induced to occupy and cultivate them. Pioneering and homesteading were philanthropic occupations of the very first order of necessity and merit.

But it must never be forgotten that the circumstances of the seventeenth century in this country were radically different from those that surround us at the dawn of the twentieth, and that many lines of public policy once eminently laudable have become obnoxious and dangerous as times change.

When a baby weighs 10 pounds it has just one alternative before it—grow or die. When, in after years, the 10 pounds has become 200 the condition of affairs is changed; further increase is suggestive rather of dropsy than of growth. The behavior most suitable to the infant nation, just stretching its unformed limbs and not yet quite certain what sort of creature it will grow to be, becomes in the highest degree absurd and detrimental when maturity has been attained and the former infant has reached the understanding and the enjoyment of the powers of manhood. Of this obvious fact, in its relation to a rational management of the public domain, sight has largely and most unfortunately been lost by the American people.

We go on hurrahing for every increase that successive censuses show in our population, with very little consideration of the quality of the people that have been added—in our agricultural area with very little consideration of its actual value to the nation—and, above all, in our production of crops, without any consideration at all of the profit of growing them or the real financial condition of the men who are feeding half the world. We go on turning round and round like the dog merely because our ancestors did so, and we take it for granted that that must be the proper thing. To sum it all up in a nutshell: Time was when every enlargement of our agricultural area conduced to the general welfare; such enlargement does not conduce to the general welfare now—quite the reverse. All the same we go on tranquilly permitting if not actively encouraging such enlargement and felicitating ourselves on that which is really, though insidiously, bringing upon us a train of appalling evils.

Before endeavoring to indicate definitely what some of these evils are and the ponderousness of the weight that they are throwing upon our financial prosperity, let me make a plain statement of the speed and energy with which the Government is dissipating and worse than dissipating our priceless heritage of cultivable lands, the property of the nation at large, and transforming what ought to be a blessing into a veritable curse.

According to the reports of the General Land Office down to July 1, 1899, the latest available, the average rate of alienation of our public lands for the decade last preceding that date was nearly 11,500,000 acres per annum, which is approximately 1,000,000 acres per month, over 31,000 acres per day, about 1,300 acres per hour, more than 21 acres per minute, or say 1 acre every three seconds, day and night, Sundays and holidays all included. Let us try to picture to ourselves what these figures mean. They mean that more than 17,000 square miles, an area considerably larger than one-third of the State of New York, is given away, practically given away, every year of our lives; nearly 1,500 square miles, considerably more than the State of Rhode Island, every month that passes; more than 2 square miles every hour.

Imagine yourselves standing at the boundary, if there were such a boundary, between the land now the property of individuals and that which still belongs to the nation at large and seeing that boundary moving before your eyes into the Government possessions at such a rate of speed that the latter were steadily shrinking, hour after hour, day after day, year after year, at the rate of 21 acres per minute! Such is the rapidity with which we are energetically squandering our most inestimable possession. Our property burns our pocket, as they say of a spendthrift's money, and it seems that we shall never rest easy until we have dissipated the whole.

Now, of course you will say at once, "Well, well, but we are not giving the land away; the National Treasury gets something for it; and besides, we are developing the country. What in the name of common sense is land good for, arable land, if not for civilized man to cultivate? We are giving homes to the homeless of all the world. There is no grander chapter in the history of mankind than the filling up of our great Western territory with industrious, intelligent, free, and happy people."

Let us consider these points.

The return that the Government receives from the average of all its agricultural land parted with, year after year, comes to so little more than enough to pay for the actual expenses of marketing it that this return may be left out of the question. And then it must be borne in mind that with the rapid increase of population in this and other countries and the consequent constant increase in the demand for food, it is perfectly certain that these wild lands of ours will be worth very much more, will actually command a much higher value in cash, if held and sold only on business principles, during the time of each successive generation than during the time of that which last preceded it. We are forcing upon a market already fearfully oversupplied the property for which the future is positively certain to bring a vastly increased demand at vastly higher prices than can now be secured for it. For all practical purposes, the lands are given away.

But we are furnishing homes to the homeless and developing the country! A great many birds have been caught with that chaff. A farm is primarily a factory, only incidentally and accidentally a home. Keep that distinction very clearly and sharply in mind, I pray you. Of course the owner may live on the premises; so may the owner of a cotton mill. But in every respect in which the occupancy of new farms at the far West affects the interests of the present owners of the property out of which they are carved—the people of the United States—each new farm is to be considered entirely as a new factory, entering directly into competition with those now established.

And as to developing the country: The long life of the passion for accomplishing that very indefinite feat is a straight case of the dog's turning round before he lies down because his ancestors discovered that the practice under the circumstances then surrounding them conduced to their well-being. A century ago, no doubt, the country needed development; but, great heavens, what is the haste to develop it further just now? Are we not numerous enough, strong enough, as a people? Could any nation on earth dream of invading our territory?

What in the world are we gaining, what can we possibly gain, by this frantic, breathless haste to develop, to fill up our whole country with people, any and every kind of people, foreigners very largely, the offscourings of the earth in no small part?

Whoever has leaned on the forward rail of a westbound Atlantic steamer and watched for a while the immigrants on the steerage deck below, as I have done many times, must pray earnestly for the day when America shall most definitely go out of the business of offering an asylum to the downtrodden of every clime. What does it profit us? For my own part, I think the development, the filling up, is going on far too rapidly to be a healthy process; and I am very sure that the not inconsiderable fraction that comes to us yearly from abroad is something that we could very, very well manage to dispense with.

And now for what is, after all, the one main point of practical interest. How are we injured—we, the farmers of the Eastern States, and the classes that depend directly upon the farmers of the Eastern States for prosperity—in what way, definitely and exactly, are we injured by the liberality of the Government in giving away its wild lands—our wild lands—as fast as possible to anybody and everybody that will take them?

In the first place of course one thinks naturally of the competition of the products of the new farms in the markets of the world. I am inclined myself to the opinion that the injury in this direction is rather less than might be supposed, and that it is, in fact, very far from being the darkest element of the problem. The growth of population must of itself take care of the increased production in part. The new farmers need an infinity of things that they can not possibly produce. That helps manufactures; manufactures require workmen; workmen must eat; and thus the established farmers of the older regions will find a certain increase in the demand for their products, making up, in part, for the new supply thrown upon the market by their increasing competitors. And then, again, the price of breadstuffs is very largely governed by the yield of crops abroad and the occurrences of every kind that take place in foreign countries. Wheat may bring a high price, though the American crop be immense; it may go begging, though our fields yield the scantiest return.

Still, of course it is patent that on the whole every new State in an agricultural region will for a long time export a considerable surplus of foodstuffs of some sort, and thus act distinctly, to a certain extent, in bearing down the market price. Most assuredly, after making all allowances, the competition of the new regions in selling just what we want to sell is a danger and an injury that must be taken into the account. But that is only the beginning.

A second channel of mischief is the absorption by the free lands of the men and women who ought to supply, and in the normal condition of things would supply, an abundance of labor, at moderate wages, for established farmers. The demand for trustworthy farm help, at prices that farmers can afford to pay, is left largely unsatisfied—to the injury of the farming interest, and perhaps most of all to the overburdening of the wife of the small farmer with tasks of which hired servants should greatly relieve her—by the facility with which the persons who ought to supply it can go West and become farmers on their own account, your property and mine being freely offered them for that purpose. Why should anybody work for you, except perhaps at extravagant compensation, when the Government is willing and anxious to make him a landed proprietor himself, without money and without price?

Nor is it farm labor alone that is drawn away from its natural homes by the recklessness of Uncle Sam in giving everybody a farm. A class of people better off financially go West also and take their money with them, the class among whom the farmer looks for tenants if he wishes to let his property, for purchasers if he wishes to sell. Why should a man of some means hire your farm or buy it if he can get one of his own for nothing, grow up with the country, and presently land in Congress and go to making laws for you and the rest of us?

Now notice, please, how these three wrongs converge to drain the very lifeblood of the established farmer who has bought his farm and paid for it, or (still worse) owes something on it. The value of his crops is reduced by unfair and illegitimate competition; the supply of labor that he needs is minimized and therefore its price enhanced, and the class among whom he ought to be able to find tenants or purchasers is immensely restricted. The same malign influences act, of course, on all his brother farmers.

Their profits, like his, are immensely diminished, and many of them, like him, are offering their farms to anybody who will pay a good rent or buy at a reasonable value. Thus an unnatural and intensely pernicious competition is set up—set up by our own Government, mind you, for which we pay—between farmers of the older States, for the disposal of their property. So, of course, the value shrinks; the farmer falls out of the rank in the social scale that he ought to hold, because his property has so little money value; for, say what you will, a man's standing in society is regulated very largely by his supposed financial means. And if he wants to borrow money on his farm, he finds not only that it will be valued far below what would be normally a reasonable sum, but also that lenders are rather loth to advance money on farm security at all, because the sale of such property is slow and uncertain.

It is maddening to think of. The American farmer ought to be the most independent being on earth, and one of the most envied. Of all property in this country, a farm ought to be the most desired and the quickest in demand. There should be a dozen would-be purchasers or tenants bidding against each other for every farm that there is supposed to be a chance to get. Farm mortgages should be the most sought for of all investments, and the interest should be reduced, by competition of lenders, to about half of what now has to be paid, while the amount that can easily be borrowed should be about twice what it is now.

It is all very well to blame the farmers of the older States for bad management when they fail to make money, and hoot at the idea that "farming don't pay." The marvel is that it pays as well as it does; the glory of the Eastern farmer is that he can make headway at all, with this horrible burden on his back.

Now, consider the equities of the case. This is no sort of a sectional plea, no setting up of one part of the country or one class of our people as entitled to any kind of special favor from the Government or special protection from competition. Not a bit of it. Nothing like it. The simple fact is just this: The public lands belong to the people at large, and it is distinctly opposed to the interest of the people at large that any more of them should be brought into cultivation, because our great basal industry, the industry on which all other American industries depend, is agriculture, and agriculture is depressed, its profits reduced, by every increase of our cultivated area.

Finally, what is to be done about it? It is too late now to hope for repeal of the homestead laws and similar out-of-date legislation in time to do much good. Ten years ago next October, when the journal with which I have the honor of being connected began the first regular attack that has ever been made on our outgrown and now suicidal national policy of dealing with the public domain, a very large area of arable land was still the property of the nation, and the work of giving it away, to the unspeakable injury of the owners, might well have been arrested. But I am sorry to say that it was then, as it very largely still is, quite impossible to rouse the class most directly interested—the farmers of the older States—to any sort of energetic action for the protection of their own well-being. Farmers' organizations, as a rule, have devoted themselves to all sorts of rainbow chasing, or have frittered away their energies on matters deserving enough, perhaps, but of very trifling consequence in comparison with the immense importance of attacking the one great evil.

Very few individual farmers could be induced to call up the matter in granges or similar bodies, or even to interview their own representatives in Congress and urge them to action. Considerably more than a hundred millions of acres—just think of it, a hundred millions of acres—have been given away since then, with hardly an audible protest from the class who were daily robbed and impoverished by the operation, until now it is almost within bounds to say that there hardly remains a desirable homestead in any State washed by the Mississippi or its affluents; and they are scarce anywhere. As the last Yearbook of the Department of Agriculture says, "all the best parts of the public domain have been appropriated, and comparatively little good agricultural land remains open to settlement." One might think we were within sight of the beginning of the end of the mischief, and might hope now for a slow improvement, the supply of wild land being nearly exhausted, while our population is increasing by leaps and bounds.

Lay not that flattering unction to your soul. We are merely entering upon a second stage in the work of spoliation. Animated by an intensely selfish and narrow desire for the so-called development of their own States and Territories at the expense of the great body of the nation, the people of the far West are raising in increasing volume, year by year, a demand for the irrigation of the immense area of arid lands now the property of the United States, that at least a hundred million acres more may be brought into the market to compete with your property and postpone to the indefinite future the time when the possessor of a good farm shall be, as he ought to be, an object of general envy. The demand for this outrageous robbery of the people takes two forms. The plot at first was to induce Congress to irrigate this vast area at the national expense—at your cost and mine—that it might be rendered attractive to new competitors in our own industry and divided among them. This scheme of open robbery, however, was a little too barefaced to be very dangerous. Nobody could help seeing that it was just like asking Congress to build factories and give them to any impecunious but enterprising applicant that came along—imagine what our manufacturers now in business would say to that! This plan, therefore, is not, just at present, pressed very actively, though still rearing its horrid front, in some form, during every session.

But another scheme has been devised, to which it is hoped there will be less objection. It is simply for the National Government to give, give out and out, all our arid lands to the States and Territories in which they happen to lie, in order that the local authorities may do the irrigating themselves. Just think of it! These lands are the property of all the people, just as much the property of the farmer in the northeast corner of Maine or at the extremity of the Florida peninsula, as of the people who live around them; five-sixths of all our population are east of the Mississippi and Missouri; and yet it is seriously proposed—yes, vehemently urged—that their ownership in the lands referred to be taken from them by force and given to the handful of people in the newer regions, these people themselves being chiefly the beneficiaries of the previous injustice of the Government under that miserable old homestead law, that the property may be used directly and actively to the injury of the present owners. It is difficult to speak with patience of a proposed iniquity like that.

If some of our Montana friends who are doing their best to bring it about were owners of valuable lots in Boston which they preferred to keep vacant until a growing demand should bring an increase in their selling value, and the Bostonians living round these lots should endeavor to seize them, under color of developing Boston and providing homes for the homeless, one can imagine the indignation of the owners and the opinion they would express of the conscienceless rapacity of the plotters. The shoe is on the other foot; it is not their ox that is gored; and the plotting and scheming goes bravely on.

This brings us directly to the answer to the question—no matter about the past—what is now to be done? Just exactly this: Let every man of you resolve to exert himself in all proper ways (and there are many) to kill every bill that comes before this present session of Congress and every future session for the irrigation under any pretense of the arid lands or for the giving of them away to the States in which they lie. You can accomplish infinitely more than you perhaps suppose if you will use your power.

The editorial pages of the Country Gentleman will keep you constantly informed of every one of these miserable bills as it comes up, giving definitely the number on the Calendar, the name of the introducer, and the committee to which it is referred. Let every man who hears me sit down then, immediately, and write a personal letter to his Senators or to his Representative, according as the bill makes its appearance in the Senate or in the House, and also to the chairman of the committee having it under consideration, invoking his active opposition. Let him ask all his neighbors to do the same. Let him see that his grange, or any sort of agricultural union with which he may be affiliated, adopts ringing resolutions of protest, and that the secretary sends copies to the Representative and the Senators. God helps those who help themselves. If the farmers of the East permit the far-Western schemers to pursue their course of determined spoliation, enriching themselves, indirectly perhaps, but not the less really, at your expense and mine, the farmers of the East must expect conditions increasingly unfavorable, year after year, decade after decade, for themselves and for their children; must expect that increasingly severe and unintermitted toil will yield increasingly meager returns, and must expect themselves to descend gradually but steadily in the social scale till there shall be none so poor to do them reverence. In time, no doubt, a century or two perhaps, conditions must change again, as our increasing population makes larger and larger demands for food, while the supply of land on which it can be raised becomes proportionally smaller.

But there is no earthly need to postpone the beginning of this recovery to an indefinite epoch in the uncertain future. Let the farmers of the East put forth but a mere fraction of the power which they most properly hold, if they would only use it, over our national legislation, to stop this tremendous and tremendously cruel and unjust competition by the beneficiaries of our own Government, and especially to strike at this hydra of an irrigation scheme in all its phases whenever it appears, and the possible prosperity of the vague future may be realized within our own time in a solid financial return for that form of labor which most deserves the triple boon of a bright and hopeful youth, a contented mind at maturity, and a competence with honor in declining years. Not, of course, that any legislation or the absence of any legislation can of itself make all farmers prosperous, any more than any legislation or the absence of any legislation can of itself make all men honest and prevent cheating. But although legislation is often impotent for good, it is always, if unwise or unjust, almost omnipotent for evil; and at the present time unwise and unjust legislation creates the one only cloud in the otherwise bright sky of American husbandry. To prevent the enactment of unwise and unjust laws, having for their sole purpose the enrichment of a comparatively restricted section of the country at the expense of all the rest—this is the one paramount duty of the hour.

THE IRRIGATION SCHEME—SHALL CONGRESS DO THE FARMERS A GREAT WRONG?

[By Frank Sherman Peer, author of Soiling, Ensilage, etc.]

The following articles were published in the Country Gentleman January 16, 23, 30, and February 6, 1902. They are published in pamphlet form for free distribution at the request of many prominent grangers and agriculturists throughout the country.

Farmers' clubs, the Grange, Farmers' Institute workers, or anyone interested in the subject may procure copies by inclosing stamps to prepay postage. As many copies will be forwarded to any address as can be sent through the mails for the stamps received. Address W. W. Van Slyke, Lock Box 475, Ithaca, N. Y.

To the United States and State legislators:

Permit me to call your attention to the following pages, which in justice to agriculture you are earnestly invited to carefully consider. It is hoped you will use your influence in behalf of your overworked and underpaid constituents.

While the Government gives real protection and assistance to all manufacturing and trade industries, it keeps giving away millions of acres of land annually for farming purposes until overproduction has depreciated farming lands fully 50 per cent in value, and agriculture as a business has become little better than unremitting toil.

To the farmer:

There has never been during the history of the United States a question before Congress so detrimental to the interest of agriculture in general, so degrading to farming as a business, as the irrigation schemes now contemplated at Washington. It is proposed to irrigate vast tracts of Western lands at the expense of the Government, thus adding to the public domain millions of acres of high-class farming lands to be given away to foreigners and others under the homestead act.

The author appeals to you to do everything in your power to defeat any such action.

ITHACA, N. Y., March 27, 1902.

AN APPEAL TO EVERY EASTERN FARMER.

EDITORS COUNTRY GENTLEMAN: The greatest question before the Eastern farmer to-day is the enormous depreciation in the value of farming lands, while the taxes on the same in most States have gone higher and higher.

Why have the farms in New York State been depreciated 50 per cent in value during the last ten years? The cause is overproduction, and the reason there is an overproduction is because the United States Government, that is supposed to be an arm of defense for all our people and a foster mother to every industry under the flag, has been setting up thousands and tens of thousands of immigrants and others yearly in the farming business.

Competition has thus become so keen that there is nothing left for an Eastern farmer to do but to work himself and his family as a foreigner does or let his farm on shares to an immigrant, who, because he is willing to live half-fed and half-clothed, without books, papers, or recreation for himself, or education for his children, can compete with men of the same class who have their farms given to them by the Government.

CONTRACT LABOR.

Look at it! The Government will not permit a farmer to say to a foreigner: "Come over here; I will give you a job drawing manure." No; the foreigner would be transported to the country from whence he came, and $2,000 fine and imprisonment would be the farmer's penalty for violation of the law. At the same time, the same Government says to the same transported immigrant: "Come back here, and Uncle Sam will give you a job; not only that, will set you up in business. If you will only come, you shall have 160 acres of land free and clear from all incumbrance." Back comes the transported foreigner, virtually under contract with the Government, while the farmer who offered him a job at drawing manure looks on through prison bars.

We have for years smarted under this humiliation, this degrading of our business, but we saw an end of the free-gift lands and lived and hoped that when it was all gone farming in the East would once more hold up its head and again become an industry that our children would be pleased to follow. Alas for all such hopes if this Western land-irrigation scheme goes through, as it surely will unless the East fights it tooth and nail from now on.

While I feel like apologizing for using disrespectful language toward the Government we all love so well, I feel that the time has come when sentiment must no longer stand in the way of judgment and truth. We (the Eastern farmers) have been looking at this glaring injustice like a barnyard fowl being submissively lifted from his perch, while he blinks with admiration at the glimmer of the candle held in his face.

I wish to show how it looks to the man who has seen the value of his farm depreciate 50 per cent within the last ten years on account of overproduction in the West, while the taxes this year are 20 per cent higher than they were ten years ago.

Our Government, in giving away an average of over 6,000,000 acres a year to foreigners for the last ten years, has not only reduced the value of our farms by half, but has degraded agriculture as a business almost to a level with these same ignorant foreigners, whom our Government has been setting up in the farming business by the tens of thousands every year, while, as I said before, farming in the Eastern States, generally speaking, is little better than unremunerative toil.

THE GOVERNMENT IN THE LOTTERY BUSINESS.

It was therefore with sadness and a feeling of additional humiliation that we saw our Government go into the lottery business last summer, so that it might dispose of a vast number of acres in a hurry. The Government of the United States has a fine and imprisonment for any man who would attempt to establish a lottery business. But the same Government goes into the enterprise, and the prizes it offers are 160 acres of land. The Government itself turns the wheel of fortune, and 150,000 foreigners and others are, in the space of two days, added to the list of producers of farm products, and, consequently, to a still further depreciation of all farm property in the Eastern States.

I defy anyone to produce from the history of the United States such a disgraceful piece of business by the Government at Washington toward any industry under the flag. A hundred Senators, a thousand Congressmen, unite in saying that agriculture is the foundation of national prosperity. At the same time they are heedless of the fact that what the Government is doing for the West it is taking from the East.

A PROFLIGATE GOVERNMENT.

There was a time when our Government could give away lands to foreigners, or anyone who wanted them, without injury to any other man; but that day has long since passed. Still the Eastern farmers have submitted without a word, believing the free-gift lands of the West would, in the hands of our profligate Government, soon be disposed of, while the cities would go on increasing, and in time prosperity would once more return to agriculture, when, lo! up comes this Western irrigation scheme, that proposes to create or redeem millions of acres of the arid plains of the West by irrigating them at a cost of millions of dollars; that there may be provision made for another million immigrants and others to go into the business of farming, largely at the expense of the Eastern farmer, who is to pay the taxes that make the scheme possible.

It was only by a hair's breadth that the entering wedge for the fulfillment of this plan failed to be driven into the river and harbor bill at the last day's session of the past Congress. It is bound to come up again during the present session, and with renewed strength. The only hope of its defeat is the united and concentrated efforts on the part of the farmers of the Eastern States. There was never in the history of the Patrons of Husbandry such an opportunity for that body to make itself useful to itself, and to demand of the Government at Washington that protection it professes to award to every citizen and every industry under the Stars and Stripes.

President Roosevelt, in a speech that he made while traveling through the West last autumn, as later in his message, gave the promoters of this irrigation scheme to understand that he was in favor of appropriating Government funds for the purpose of irrigating large tracts of Western lands.

President Roosevelt is, first and above all else, a genuine sportsman; therefore play fair, and fair play is with him a cardinal virtue. That President Roosevelt has committed himself to such a scheme merely shows that he has not been in possession of the facts. It is for the grange and every individual farmer of the Eastern States to see to it that this question is thoroughly and forcibly brought to the notice of every Senator and Representative at Washington, and to the President as well. Heretofore the scheme has been kept in the dark until the last moment, when the attempt has been made to railroad it through as a rider on some other bill. Judging from the past, this question will be kept very quiet, and the same tactics will surely be resorted to this season as last; and the silence on the question at Washington should arouse the grange to the greatest activity and without delay.

GOVERNMENT-MADE FARMERS.

As a rule the United States Government may not go into a business enterprise of any kind that comes into competition with private enterprises. There is at least one exception to this rule. The Government is in the business of making farmers on a gigantic scale; it turns them out by the tens of thousands every year. This might not be so bad, if in setting up these agriculturists the Government was able to produce good ones. The majority of Government-made farmers are a disgrace to the calling, as I shall presently attempt to show.

About a year ago I was standing in the streets of Antwerp, Belgium, when my attention was called to a great procession coming down the street, headed by a tall, well-dressed man. "What's the crowd," I asked a gentleman as we stepped aside to let them pass.

"They are going to the ship," he replied. "Twelve hundred of them go from here every Saturday."

"Where are they going," I asked.

"To America."

"To America! The Lord have mercy upon us! Can not these people find work at home?"

"Well, not much; we are very pleased to see that class going away."

"I should think you would be," I replied, as we moved into the center of the road for a better quality of air. A drove of cattle would have been rose water in comparison. I have been in Holland and Belgium for three weeks, and so well were the people dressed, so clean and modern were all their streets, that the emigrant question had not entered my mind until this drove came tramping along, with all their worldly goods in sheets, pillowcases, and red bandanas, headed for the wharf—destination, America.

"Who is that fellow," I inquired, "that seems to be the leader?"

"Oh, that is the ship's agent. He goes out every week and collects a cargo. He gets about a dollar per head for running them in."

"What inducement does he offer them?" I asked, thinking of the contract-labor law.

"Oh, he tells me that the United States Government will give them a farm of 160 acres out West and that Eastern bank agents will give them money to build a house and barn on it; that agricultural machine agents will let them have all the tools they require, and take their notes for them.

"He tells them they only need money enough to get to where the Government has a farm to give them. Their passage to New York costs $15, and for $10 or $15 more they are taken in special trains to where Uncle Sam stands ready to keep his part of the contract, and give them 160 acres of land as a reward for coming to America and an outlay of $25 or $30 to get there. Then he tells them of the wonders of the great West, exhibits photographs of farms owned by emigrants who have preceded them but a few years, etc. In this way he and his assistants are able to 'round up' 1,000 to 1,200 converts who are willing to go. This goes on week after week the year round."

DON'T HAVE TO KNOW ANYTHING TO FARM IN AMERICA.

As he spoke I felt the blood getting hot within me at the thought of the hundreds of formerly well-off American farmers who had given up the struggle, let their farms to foreigners, their children forsaking the homestead because it could only be made to pay by the most slavish toil. "Going to America to farm, are they?"

"Well, that is the great inducement the agent offers them," was the reply.

"Do these men know anything about farming?" I inquired.

"Not one in fifty," my informer said; "but that doesn't matter, you don't have to know anything about farming to farm in America."

"Don't have to know anything about farming to farm in America!" Fancy, if you can, the state of my mind at hearing this! It was the first time in my life that I was ever ashamed to confess that I was an American citizen and an American farmer. "Don't have to know anything about farming to farm in America!" I confess I was ashamed to let that stranger know I was a citizen of a country that was the dumping ground for the human rubbish of every other country in the world, China excepted, and to think our country was coaxing tens of thousands of this class every month to our shores, and, as this gentleman said, principally a class that the country whence they came "are very pleased to see taking their departure," and the inducement that is used by shipping agents, which amounts to a Government agency in collecting a weekly cargo, is the promise of a farm.

Under what obligation, I ask, is our Government to invite, yes, coax over to this country the lowest class from all nations and set them up in the farming business in competition with our farmers, who are already driven almost to bankruptcy because of the competition, largely of this very class? The gentleman told the truth. A man with a thimbleful of brains is quite good enough to become an American farmer, at least in the eyes of our Government. Farmers these immigrants are not. They do not know the first principles of agriculture; but that is no matter; that does not enter into the contract at all. They need not know a pitchfork from a shovel plow. All the Government seems anxious about is to get rid of 160 acres of land. As long as the fellow looks like an immigrant and smells like an immigrant, that is quite qualification enough for the Government, and if he will live like an immigrant and work like one, that is all the money lenders and machine agents care to know.

LAND PIRATES.

Of course they will go on robbing the soil of its fertility, for they have the power to destroy without the knowledge to redeem. Farmers they are not; they are only a lot of land robbers. Many of them have looted the fertility of a good 160-acre farm the Government has given them in one State and have gone on to another—a lot of land pirates, living on the fatness of the soil and leaving to posterity a farm robbed of its fertility.

"They don't have to know anything about farming to farm in America." Of course these Government farmers are mortgaged up to their eyes, but that makes them no less our competitors. The railroads carry their products past our doors to the seaboard about as cheaply as we can deliver them there ourselves.

Only a few years ago, when there was little room abroad for the Western wheat surplus, and these Government farmers were so numerous that competition was keen among themselves even on land that had been given them, they jumped eagerly at the idea of paying their mortgages with 50-cent dollars. Now, if they could induce the Government to irrigate their lands for them, they would indeed be in clover.

FARMING IN THE EASTERN STATES.

"But how about Eastern farmers?" I asked one of these Westerners who was talking the irrigation scheme.

"Oh," he replied, "farming has gone to the devil in the Eastern States, anyway. All that country is good for now is to raise chickens and garden sass. Come out West, if you want to see farming. We are the people. The agriculturists of this country are in the West. We are going," he continued, "to have the grandest thing on earth when we get that irrigation scheme working. York State won't be knee-high to a grasshopper as an agricultural State after that." Then he went on to tell me of the great canals and dams and reservoirs, and the wonderful crops that were going to supply the world, etc.

"What is it going to cost," I asked, "to build these great irrigation canals?"

"Oh, we want about $100,000,000 for a starter—for a starter, mind you."

"Where do you expect to get the money?"

"From Washington, my boy, from Washington! You just look sharp and you will see something drop before this session of Congress ends."

And so we did. It dropped on the river and harbor bill the last day, in the afternoon, but the excrescence was fortunately cut off, though at the cost of the defeat of the whole bill.

PROTECTION FOR FARMERS.

Protection, indeed! Look about in these days, when every factory, every machine shop, and every mill is running full time, and many of them night and day, under the beneficent effects of a high protective tariff—and what is there in it all for the farmer? It is true he is selling a little more, and some things at better prices than he received during the panic, simply because there are more laborers earning money now to buy with; but the benefits that agriculture is receiving during these years of unprecedented prosperity are but the reflection of borrowed light from the other industries. We are regaled by statistics showing that when wheat advances 3 cents per bushel it adds to the income of the American farmers about $4,000,000.

It seems like a large sum; farmers must be getting rich; but when it is divided among the lot there is hardly the price of a ready-made pair of shoes in it for each. The probabilities are that 90 per cent of the wheat grown east of the Mississippi is even now grown at a loss.

What does it signify to say that the farmers are making $100,000 this year, when they lost double that amount last year? The price of farming lands is the only condition by which to judge of the prosperity of agriculture, and that has been steadily on the decline since 1870, until in these days there is little or no market for a farm. What, then, becomes of all this agricultural prosperity that the politicians are telling us about? Who wants to buy a farm? No one. Who wants to sell a farm? Everyone.

FARMING IN THE FIFTIES AND NOW.

It is the purpose of this article to contrast the conditions of agriculture in the State of New York to-day with what it was in the fifties.

I speak of farming before 1860, because after that there was an unnatural boom in agriculture, owing to the war, and this may be said to have lasted for about ten years. In 1870 or 1872 agriculture had returned to its normal condition, or to about the same level that it occupied in the latter part of the fifties. I wish to show that while all other industries in the United States have and are to-day receiving protection from foreign competition by the Government at Washington, the Government public-land policy since 1870 has been such that agriculture has had less than no protection at all. It is true that there is a protective duty on agricultural products coming from Canada; but all that is saved to the American farmer by tariff protection is lost ten times over by the Government's setting up from fifty to a hundred thousand foreigners annually in the business of agriculture since 1870. This policy, which continues to this day, is ruinous to the farming interests. While the Government saves for the American farmer a little at the vent, the same Government lets everything free at the bung. For every dollar the Government saves the farmer in the East by protection it gives away 160 acres of land to a foreigner in the West.

GENTLEMEN FARMERS OF THE FIFTIES.

I wish to show you the farmers of the fifties as I knew them, and to contrast them and their circumstances with the farmers living on the same farms to-day, surrounded, as they are, with all the improved machinery, with better freight rates, and enlarged markets. There was in Wayne County, N. Y., in the fifties a community or neighborhood of some 18 or 20 farmers, living within a radius of 2 to 3 miles, that left on my mind an indelible impression of what it meant then to be a farmer. These men owned farms of 100 to 150 acres. Many of them had themselves helped to clear them of forests or stumps left by the axes of their fathers. My recollection of them, however, is during the latter half of the fifties. There was not a man of the number that I could mention who pretended to do a day's manual labor on his farm. They might help to "strike a furrow" or lend a hand in a hurrying time, but, as a rule, my recollection of them is that they were a lot of gentlemen farmers.

The majority of them went about their farms, cane in hand, dressed in a "claw-hammer" or frock coat, with brass buttons. They wore white shirts, high standing collars, and broad silk or satin stocks; their boots were well cleaned or greased every morning from a skillet of tallow that was always kept standing on the stove for that purpose. These farmers not only went about their farms with the air of gentlemen, but they dressed like gentlemen, looked and talked like gentlemen, and acted like gentlemen.

I am not saying that a man can not work his own farm and be a gentleman. I am giving you my impression of these farmers as I thought of them at the time, and for that matter ever since. The words "gentleman farmer" was used in those days as it still is in England—meaning a man who owned and lived on his farm and managed the business part of it, while the labor was performed by hired help. These gentleman farmers had no other business besides their farms. They drove into town to sell their crop, and again to see it weighed and to collect the money. Their sons and daughters were sent to school and also to college, and these gentleman farmers themselves would compare favorably with an equal number of the most cultivated gentlemen in Wayne County to-day, regardless of occupation.

GRUBBING FARMERS OF THE NINETIES.

Two years ago I visited this same neighborhood. I saw there men working these same farms, who had all they could possibly do to make both ends meet, assisted by patented machinery, of which the farmers of the fifties never dreamed, having to work, toil, slave. What I saw there on those farms, compared with the way the gentlemen farmers of the fifties lived, was enough to sadden one's heart for all time. I saw men on farms of 100 to 150 acres, that represented an investment of $10,000 to $15,000, working as no slave was ever asked to work, dressed as only the commonest laborers dress, their wives in calico gowns, hardly presentable to the members of their own family, with no help in the kitchen except the farmers's own daughters. The shabby carpets, the empty libraries, the general absence of books and papers, was an ominous contrast to the former wealth of those homes in these respects, as I knew them in the fifties.

Here, only a little over thirty years ago, the master and mistress of a home I visited entertained the bishops of the church, legislators from Washington, and men of distinction in law and medicine. From here their daughters went to school or college, as did the sons and daughters of their neighbors, returning with parchments from Lima, Geneva, Philadelphia, and New York City. Here they lived amid a houseful of laughter, music, and good cheer. Where in former years a farmer walked about his broad acres overseeing his workmen, now plods the owner, with weary steps, in the furrow, and follows, at a shambling gait, his manure cart to the fields, and this on a farm that has cost him $12,000. The owner of this farm, at the time of my visit, was doing the work himself of two hired men, toiling from 4 a. m. until 8 p. m., and his wife and three children were that very day at a neighbor's picking berries by the quart to earn money. They had to do this to make both ends meet. The whole family were dressed like tramps, not a smile on their faces, all mirth gone out of their souls, and all hurrying on to a premature grave.

Have I overdrawn this picture? I wish you might say I had. But look about you, reader, and see how many farmers you can count in your neighborhood (solely dependent on their farms for every cent of income) and how many out of twenty are making 6 per cent on their investment? No merchant would be content with that. How many are making more than enough each year to pay their hired help, who has nothing invested, and their taxes?

WHY FARMERS' SONS AND DAUGHTERS ARE LEAVING THE FARM.

The worst feature of the general depression in agriculture remains to be told. The farmers' sons and daughters refuse to remain on the farm. There is nothing in it, and away they go to town and city. One grand old gentleman farmer, a relic of the fifties, told me, with the tears coursing down his dear old face, that his three sons and only daughter had all left him.

Not one of them would take the farm and work it as a gift.

A foreigner was working the place on shares, and will soon be living in the $10,000 home that was built in anticipation of making the farm attractive for his own kith and kin. But who can blame these sons and daughters for leaving the farm? Not I. Selling peanuts on the street corner has more independence in it than a hundred-acre farm where the taxes and hired help run off with all the earnings, leaving the owner and his wife to work for their board and clothes. A boy sees a merchant in town with half the capital, or less, invested in business that his father has in the farm, and the merchant and his family appear well dressed, prosperous, and happy, while his own father and mother are slaves.

So it has come about that on the 20 farms I have been speaking of over half are worked on shares by foreigners. Why by foreigners? Simply because a foreigner is willing to slave as his Western immigrant competitors do and can. It is, as I said before, because the Government policy of giving away millions of acres every year to foreigners has reduced farming as a business in the Eastern States, if not over the whole country, almost to an immigrant farmer's level, and therefore nearly, if not quite, to the state of peasant farming in the old country.

Thus our farms have depreciated 50 per cent in value, which means a loss of hundreds of millions to New York State alone. Thus has it come about that farmers' sons and daughters are driven from the farm, and their fathers and mothers are left to toil at lower wages than the commonest laborer receives for the commonest piece of work and no invested capital.

The Eastern farmer and his wife have suffered all this to make the West great in a hurry, and while they toil and slave to try to get ahead the Government at Washington keeps setting up foreign competitors against them by the tens of thousands. What do you think would happen in this country, reader, if the Government should begin setting up foreigners in the manufacturing business? The manufacturers would be up in arms in a hurry, and their arms would be charged with powder and shot.

But, do you say, "This would be different?" Not at all. The difference is only in degree, not in kind, and agriculture has, I believe, $20 invested in the State for every $1 that is in a factory.

Is not a farmer as much a manufacturer as a man who owns a woolen mill? Certainly he is. His sheep under his management convert grass into wool, while under the management of the manufacturer wool is converted into cloth. If it is wrong for our governors to set up foreigners in competition with one business, it is equally wrong to establish them in any other business.

WHERE THE BLAME LIES.

I have, in a former article, spoken of the Government's error in adopting an outrageous public-land policy; but I must be fair and place the blame of the present condition of things where it belongs, and that is largely upon the farmers themselves. We have never asked the Government to alter its public-land policy, and we ought to know by this time that there is little accomplished at Washington unless some one is there to present and work for it.

I know how the farmers of the country feel in this matter. They feel that they have all that they can manage at home and that the question is too big. Again, there is among farmers a feeling that the questioning of anything that Uncle Sam does savors of disloyalty. One remembers perhaps that his father or his great-grandfather was an immigrant, and he hesitates to put anything in the way of any other man, and finally he has consoled himself with the idea that the Government in its mad haste to squander the public domain, would ultimately come to the end of its tether; and, taking it altogether, he has bowed his head to the yoke, and hope, the farmers' sheet-anchor, has kept him from crying out. But with this Western land-irrigation monster staring him in the face, he has come to the conclusion, let us hope, that forebearance is no longer a virtue, and he is beginning to inquire what can be done, and how shall he go about it. What precedent is there as a guide or encouragement to him that his petition will be noticed at Washington?

UNITED WORKMEN.

Let us see. A few years ago there was organized a society of laboring men in this State. They sent a delegation to Albany to ask that contract prison labor be abolished, because they alleged it was unfair to them as workmen that the State government should keep men in employment; that the labor these convicts did belonged to them. The result was that although this labor organization represented no invested capital and paid no taxes as does the farmer, contract prison labor fell like a tree to the woodman's ax.

CHINESE LABOR.

Again, a few thousand people of the United States out of as many millions, sent word to Washington that the Chinaman was working so much cheaper in San Francisco than American laborers could afford to work that they wanted him shut out. They said: "These Chinamen are willing to live on rats and rice; they have become so numerous that wages are going down." Forthwith up goes the Chinese wall, not around the city of San Francisco or the great State of California, but around the whole United States—a wall so high that Mr. John can not even look in. If a ship with a Chinese sailor on board lands in any port of the United States, the Government has men on board that ship day and night to see that the Chinaman does not set foot on American soil.

Here we have a parallel case with the one under discussion; but in comparison to the injury that the Government-made farmers have done to agriculture as a business, to say nothing of the depreciated value in farming lands, this Chinese question is as a few thousand Californians are to the 77,000,000 of people living in the United States.

CONTRACT LABOR.

Again, the "United Workmen" went to Washington and said to Uncle Sam: "This foreign contract-labor business is an injury to our interests. Contractors go or send abroad for a carload of immigrants who are willing to work for less than we are getting. These immigrants are willing to live on what in our families goes to waste. We don't want them here competing against us. We have our homes to pay for, and our homes, as well as the labor of our hands, are cheapened by letting such immigrants in. We want this foreign contract labor stopped."

"Why, certainly, of course," Uncle Sam replied; "very glad you called my attention to the fact"—and contract immigrant labor was no more.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS WITH FOREIGNERS.

What comparison, may I ask, is the harm to this country of a few hundred foreigners coming over here to dig sewers and build railroads when laborers are scarce, to the 25,000 to 50,000 immigrants the Government coaxes over here yearly to make farmers of them? I call your attention to the fact that in all these cases the point made is identically the same that the farmer must make. A precedent has therefore been established that makes the farmer's demands unanswerable. A city contractor may not say to a foreigner: "I will give you 60 cents a day if you will come over here to work." But the Government may and does keep saying to the same immigrant: "I agree to give you 160 acres of land if you will come over here;" and it does not even require the immigrant to work for it. It is true the gift lands of the West, in the hands of the Government, are narrowing down, and must ultimately come to an end; but there are millions and millions of acres yet in the hands of the great railroad corporations that can be bought for a dollar or less per acre.

LAND SPECULATORS AND MONEY LENDERS.

But the Western land speculators and the bank agents who have fattened by the Government's land policy see their trade on the wane, and to keep themselves in the market they have concocted the scheme to have the Government spend hundreds of millions to reclaim arid plains, which means the making of another million of immigrants into farmers without money and without price.

If I mistake not, this irrigation scheme is going to be the last straw. The worm will turn at this. If not, then must agriculturists of the Eastern States become slaves to unremitting toil that the immigrant may continue to have a 160-acre farm given to him and the land speculators and money lenders continue to fatten. I have spoken plainly. I have meant to be only fair and just. Let me admonish you, my fellow-farmers, that if this scheme is to be defeated, you, every one of you, must move and move now. If you belong to the Grange, have that body send a petition to your Congressmen and to your Senators. If you do not belong to any farm organization, write a letter yourself to your Congressman or circulate a petition in your neighborhood. You can at least do something. Do it. Do not neglect it, or the Lord have mercy on all farmers and on farming for the next hundred years to come.

When you make this demand for justice and right, insist that in the future no Government land shall be disposed of for less than $10 per acre, and that when there is a demand for it at that price the Government may sell it to actual settlers and to no others, and that the money received for the same be devoted to agricultural schools and colleges. And do not neglect to say that if there is to be any irrigating scheme going on at the expense of the Government, there is more need of its being done for the farmers in the Eastern States that have had their business practically ruined already that the West might prosper, than there is of spending the money in the West, where a man may still have a farm for the asking.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. BURKETT.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have, under the order of the House, the right to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House the gentleman has the right to extend his remarks in the RECORD. The gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. BURKETT, is recognized.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I can conclude just what I have to say in five minutes. I therefore ask unanimous consent to conclude my remarks. I think possibly ten or fifteen minutes will be sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for fifteen minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. Chairman, I have listened for a day to the discussions upon this bill and it might be well for us, before we lose ourselves in a good many proposed amendments, to get back and consider this proposition from a practical standpoint. It has been developed from the discussion that west of the one hundredth degree of longitude in the United States there is a territory that in extent is a mighty empire. Its plains are covered with nature's beautiful carpet, its hillsides are clothed in forests, its valleys are rich, and its mountains are filled with precious metals.

In acres and square miles it equals the whole of Europe, as some one said; its natural resources, if properly husbanded, would sustain a population twice that of the United States, has also been asserted, and yet in all that vast domain the reclaiming hand of man has scarcely touched. Here and there, perhaps, a venturesome son of the East has gone and reared for himself a habitation, or an occasional uncovering of the treasures of nature in the bosom of the earth has builded a city, but in the main that country remains to-day as we found it an hundred years ago. There it lies, unknown and barren, only waiting the hand of man to reclaim it. It is estimated that in that region there are a hundred million acres—equal to three States the size of Iowa, as large as all New England—that can be irrigated. I think of what that means to the homeless people of America in the overcrowded centers of population. I think of what it means to the young men of succeeding generations, the opening up of that great territory. I think of what it means as a market for the manufactories of this country.

I dare not estimate the value to those States in particular, and to the whole of the United States in general, of the provisions of the bill that is now under consideration. One hundred million acres of land. Every foot of it level, fertile, and productive soil. It will make homes for a million and a half of families, and sustain a hundred millions of people. It will make new mining projects possible. It will give forage to additional thousands of cattle that will pasture the adjoining hills. In short, it will plant west of the Missouri a mighty empire, rich, powerful, and prosperous, under the American flag, loyal to American institutions of government, devoted to the United States and her interests, and patriotic for the upbuilding and development of the old Republic that we all love so well.

Sirs, in supporting the bill for national aid to irrigation I do it in behalf of the thousands of homeless children in the United States, in behalf of the toiling masses who go home at eventide to a fireside that is not their own. Aye, sirs, for the many of old and young who, if called to a reckoning now, have not a foot of soil that they can call home. I speak in behalf of the wage-earner, that his opportunities may be multiplied as new territory is opened up and new industries established. I speak for the manufacturer, ever alert for new markets. I speak for the farmer and the farmer's son, who, pinched and crowded in the old homestead, are asking for an opportunity to help build up another State, as they have their own. I speak for the miner who delves the mountains in his hazardous and perilous undertaking to replenish the treasury of the world, that he may be surrounded by civilization and assured of the necessaries of life. I speak as a Western man, thoroughly alive to the needs of the West and anxiously intent upon her upbuilding and development. And yet I would not permit local interest to deter me from doing, or to drive me into doing, that which I conceive to be inimical to the best interests of the whole commonwealth.

This country is one homogeneous whole; one socially, politically, and commercially. The things that make for one make for all. To be sure, some particular legislation may be of more benefit to one locality than to another, but what helps materially one community injures none in the end.

I have supported a protective tariff all my life, perhaps on some things from which I drew no direct personal benefit, but as I protected some industry and builded up somewhere a labor market for idle hands I have helped indirectly every citizen in the United States. The things that are for the betterment of mankind anywhere in this Republic of ours are for the good of the whole of it.

For a hundred years we have been pushing out into unknown territory and reclaiming it for the benefit of our people. George Washington, in his time, surveyed lands and pushed settlements across the Allegheny Mountains. The Ohio Valley was settled, and in due time the rich valleys of the Mississippi and of the Missouri were invaded and reclaimed for the benefit of humanity. Onward and across the Missouri, up the valley of the Platte, went the outriders of the nation, taming and subduing, civilizing and reclaiming, as it were, from wild nature the soil and the elements for man's good purposes. Countless treasure we have expended in surveying and exploring every step of the way. We speak of this expense, and yet, sir, every step from the Atlantic as we have moved on across the continent, we have been expending the money of the Treasury of these United States. We have bought out the rights of the Indians; we have assisted railways; we have builded highways and canals; we have improved our rivers and our harbors; we have established post-offices and erected public buildings. Yet, sirs, there can be found in all the length and breadth of this land no man to criticise that work, for a nation can have no loftier motive for its acts than to encourage home building for its people.

This bill that we now have before us is only another step in this direction. It looks only to the harnessing of another element that heretofore the people of this nation have not reckoned with, and making it do duty for man's well being. I call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] to this. If the blasting out of the rock in New York Harbor in aid of commerce owned and controlled by private enterprise is a governmental function; if extending aid to the great transcontinental transportation companies that opened up and made accessible the Western half of our country and brought the Golden Gate in touch with the Eastern marts of commerce was a governmental function, then to my mind the subduing of the mountain torrent for man's use, thus bringing together the water and the soil, is not only a governmental function, but it is a governmental duty.

I have stood by the Platte River in the springtime, as the snow waters from the mountains, extending from hill to hill across a broad and fertile valley, rushed on to the ocean, a raging torrent, a mighty engine of destruction. I have watched where that river pours itself a great sea into the Missouri, and from thence I have listened day by day to the dreadful tales of misery, suffering, and pestilence that it carried to the people all along the way as it hurried itself to the Gulf. I have read the "Break in the dike," and have learned of the peril which awaits thousands of people, and of the destruction so inevitable to millions of property, because, sir, that mighty beast of the springtime, that roaring, raging torrent goes on uncurbed. I have looked up to see how much money we have been expending to protect the banks of the Mississippi River in Mississippi and Louisiana from floods, and I find that over forty millions of dollars have been appropriated to the Mississippi River Commission alone.

Now, sir, that is a dreadful picture of suffering, of want and desperation there in certain seasons of the year. But just stop and turn your eyes if you can, to another picture that we might draw. It is higher up the stream. It is nearer the fountain head and of a different nature, but it is no less dreadful. It is in western Nebraska, Kansas, Wyoming, and Montana during the month of August. The sun is shining forth his fairest. His rays are delving their deepest and are warming the tiniest roots of vegetation. All nature, save in this one particular, seems to be vieing with itself to make plenty and happiness in the land, but there is lacking of moisture. Through man's neglect it has been permitted to waste. Those streams once torrential are now dry and there is not water to supply the land. The ground bakes. The verdure writhing in the sun curls and twists its life away. Sirs, the thought must come to you, as it has so often come to me, surely there never was intended to be such waste in nature. That water which only a few months before, in its anxious rush for an early playtime in the ocean, had destroyed so much of life and property was intended for better purposes and should have been restrained from going until it performed its mission. If it had been held back in the springtime and turned loose now how the flooded districts down there would have appreciated it then, and how the parched districts would appreciate it now. From this all comes the injunction that man must husband the resources of nature for his own betterment and edification.

The value of a stream for irrigation purposes is measured by its flow at its lowest stage. A stream might run bank full nine months out of the year and half as much during the other three, but it would be estimated for irrigation purposes only by its lowest point. Streams that go tearing down the valleys in April, May, and June, leaving death and destruction in their wake, are contracted to little rivulets in July and August. If the Government can aid in storing the water that goes to waste in the spring, either by dams or reservoirs, and turn it loose in the critical months, and thus raise the lowest mark of the river, the value for irrigation will be increased. This is the object of the bill that is now under consideration.

The pending bill is not extravagant in its terms. It does not call for large drains from the Treasury. In fact, it only asks that money coming from the sale of lands in those States in which irrigation is necessary shall be set aside for irrigation purposes, or to quote its language:

> That all moneys received from the sale and disposal of public lands, * * * including the surplus of fees and commissions in excess of allowances to registers and receivers, and excepting the 5 per cent of the proceeds of the sales of public lands in the (named) States set aside by law for educational and other purposes, shall be, and the same are hereby, reserved, set aside, and appropriated as a special fund in the Treasury, to be known as the reclamation fund, to be used in the examination and survey for and the construction and maintenance of irrigation works for the storage, diversion, and development of waters for the reclamation of arid and semiarid lands in the States and Territories and for the payment of all other expenditures provided for in this act.

It then provides how the work shall be prosecuted; how the Secretary of the Interior shall make examinations and surveys for and locate and construct irrigation works for the storage and development and diversion of waters.

This is not too much to ask of the Government, in our opinion. Those States simply ask that the money coming from them be used in them. They do not ask that the money be given to the States for the States to expend. The bill does not call for any cession to the States of the Government holdings. The Government shall retain every acre, dispose of it when and as it sees fit, and collect every dollar and expend every dollar of the proceeds. In short, we ask that the Government shall improve its own property in those States only to the limit of the income it derives from the same property. No fairer bill was ever presented for the consideration of Congress. We have expended money by the millions in river and harbor improvements that was collected in taxes from the whole country. The West has paid her share uncomplainingly. She has realized that harbors must be built that her products may go to market. Money and property have been granted for the extension of the many great means of commerce. Certainly, then, it is not too much to ask that the Government improve its own property for its own good and the welfare of every American citizen.

There may be faint hearts in this as there are in all great undertakings. To some the project may seem so large as to be alarming. To some who have traveled from the Missouri River to the Pacific the task may seem not only an endless one, but an impracticable one. But to those it may be said that all the land in those States can never be reclaimed. The mountains and the hills can not be reached. It is the fertile valleys that is contemplated and that should be made to blossom with the productions of man's handiwork. Neither is it intended or expected that the work of reclaiming the arid lands shall be accomplished in a year, nor perhaps in our lifetime. It is not best, perhaps, that it should. The work should go on only so fast as the land is needed for the actual home builder. Every safeguard has been thrown around the bill to make it impossible of speculation. Water rights are limited, acquisition of land is limited in amount, and the bill specially provides that—

> Beneficial use shall be the basis, the measure, and the limit of the right.

I might say in passing, for the benefit of those who are unfamiliar with the real origin of this particular bill, that it is the combined judgment of men who have given time and attention to the subject, or perhaps, to better express it, that it is the compromise of contending opinions upon the question. It is the bill of the united West. It perhaps is not exactly anyone's bill. It goes further than some would have gone in some particulars, and on the other hand falls very far short of where others would have it go in other particulars. Some thought that the Government should, on its own account, without regard to any particular source of the money expended, proceed to irrigate and reclaim the West.

That there should be Federal construction and control not only of the reservoirs, but over the great ditches and the laterals; that the water should be furnished to the individual. Others believed that the Government should do nothing more than conserve the waters and turn it into the stream at the proper seasons, to be appropriated as the water now is appropriated. The result is a harmonizing of the two ideas, while preserving the strongest features of each. The Government probably could not undertake to distribute the water to the user, for conditions of water use will vary in different localities. The law that would be appropriate in one community or in one State might not be adequate in another condition. Distribution should be left to individual enterprise, and in the main should be regulated and controlled by State laws and by State boards of engineers.

On the other hand, States could not undertake the work of conservation of water for the reason that the water might be in one State and the land to be reclaimed might be in another. The rivers may, as they actually do, rise in the mountains of California, while the lands to be irrigated are down on the plains of Nevada. The source of water may be on one side of the watershed and the irrigable lands may be on the other side of it and in another State. Thus an irrigation proposition may or may not be coextensive with State lines. Topography has not always controlled in making our geography, but geography is quite as much a question to be solved in irrigation as is topography. Political divisions must be reckoned with, for State lines have been established more often by parallels of longitude and latitude than by mountain crests and physical conditions.

Then, too, land in one State may be irrigated for one-half what it could be irrigated for in another State from the same water supply. Economy demands that the general supervision should be of common origin. The Federal Government is of right and necessity the great arbiter.

I remember the other day of hearing a very pleasant and scholarly gentleman, and a very valuable member of this House, stand up and say that he spoke for the farmers of his State against this irrigation measure. He asked, Where is humid America to profit by this bill? But I do not believe his mature reflections will sustain his position. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who has just spoken this morning, opposes irrigation, as he says, because it is an injustice to the man who owns a farm farther east. But, sirs, I ask the gentleman from Ohio, is it an injustice to the many, many times more men who own no farms at all? Let the gentleman from Ohio go home and tell the laboring men of his district why he should legislate to send up the price of land for the man who owns a farm and not give the man who owns no land at all any chance whatever at a parcel of the bosom of mother earth.

I deny that it will in any way injure the landowner. But, sirs, if it did build up for him a competitor without a compensatory consumer, I ask when in the history of this great national legislative body did we become the special protectors and guardians of the man who hath to the exclusion and detriment of the man who hath not? [Applause.] Let me ask the gentleman from Ohio, is it an injustice to the man of moderate means to develop territory and open up and make available more land for settlement? Is it an injustice to the manufacturers of his district who have sent in here thousands of petitions that they may have more markets for their wagons and their corn plows, their reapers and thrashers, and their furniture? Is it an injustice to the labor that constitutes three-fourths of those manufactured articles? Is it an injustice to the railroads that he spoke of that have pushed across the continent into those barren wastes, full of faith and confidence in the Government to reclaim its own land for its own people in due time?

The labor organizations of this country have asked for the passage of this bill. The manufacturers have asked for it, and from every State have come the petitions asking for the enactment of a law along these lines. The American Federation of Labor indorse it. Every member, perhaps, in this House has had a letter and a copy of the resolutions passed by the National Building and Trades Council. The following organizations, among many, indorse it:

The United Mine Workers of America,
The Chicago Federation of Labor,
The Illinois State Federation of Labor,
The National Business League,
The National Board of Trade,
The National Association of Manufacturers,
The National Association of Agricultural Implement and Vehicle Manufacturers,
The National Association of Wagon Makers,
The New York Manufacturers' Association, and
The National Association of Merchants and Tailors.

I find there have been introduced only this morning resolutions asking for the passage of an irrigation law from the following organizations:

The New England Shoe and Leather Association,
The Commercial Club of St. Paul,
The Central Labor Union, of Hartford, Conn.,
The United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of Pittsburg,
The Trade and Labor Federation of New Brunswick, N. J., and
The Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen of Lehighton, Pa.

And if we would search the records of this session we would find that every member of this House has introduced a resolution from some portion of the people of his district asking for this legislation.

Let me call the attention of gentlemen of this House to the fact that the demand for this legislation does not come from the West alone. There are too few of us out there to make this mighty clamor. We may be noisy, but we are not numerous, and you do us too much honor when you give to us the credit for this mighty wave of public clamor. Follow it back to its source. You may get your wires crossed, but trace the current back and you will find it originating in the factories and in the mills, in the labor organizations, and in the farmers' institutes. That is where this clamor is coming from. Sirs, at noon hour with his fellows and at evening with his family around his fireside the man without a home is talking of this very proposition. It may carry little of hope to him individually, for his circumstances may be such that he can not avail himself of it, but there is a boy and a girl, the pride of his eye, the devotion of his heart, the objects of his love, whom he longs to see installed in a home of their own. In his reveries there comes to him the environs of nature, the freedom of breath, the fullness of strength, the boon of health, and he indulges no fonder hope than that such pleasures and opportunities may come to his offspring.

Men of the East, make no mistake in measuring public sentiment in your community. I have here petitions from almost every town in the length and breadth of this land. They have been filed with the Committee on Irrigation. They come from the manufacturers everywhere and the labor organizations. So, I say, make no mistake in measuring the public sentiment in your community. A man with a horse may be the only man who can ride, but he can not darken covetous eyes, and he will never be able to take away the desire of other people to ride. But I deny that irrigation will injure any farmer anywhere. Irrigation does not mean one single bushel of grain in competition with the farmer of Ohio and Pennsylvania, in my judgment. This is true, first, because the man on irrigated land could not afford it, and second, because the markets could not afford it. Let me explain more at length. No man can farm irrigated land and supply water artificially and compete with another who farms land supplied with moisture by nature. Some one may suppose they can, and say they raise so much more that it pays, but, sirs, it will not stand competition. If it did, why is there not irrigation in humid territory? On the one hand nature supplies all the elements, on the other one must be added by man.

Staple products in Ohio and Pennsylvania that are produced at a profit would be raised at a loss on irrigated lands. If irrigated lands are made profitable, something specially adapted to those conditions must be raised. Hence those things that need much water for maturity or those things that mature quickly and produce many crops each season only are produced. Thus we find citrus fruits and alfalfa are the principal crops of irrigated lands. Every ear of corn and every spear of oats that will ever be planted on these lands thus reclaimed will be consumed in that region. Aye, more than that. They will be consumed on the very ground where they are raised. Nothing of cereals will be shipped out; but, on the other hand, much will need to be shipped in. A man who owns and manages a grain elevator in eastern Nebraska told me last summer that in two years he had shipped little of oats or corn East. Most of it had gone into Wyoming or Montana, where irrigation had made more men and more horses and more cattle. It has added a market to us in Nebraska. Our farmers are not afraid of it, and why should you of Ohio and New York and Pennsylvania, a thousand miles away, be alarmed?

As those valleys are irrigated and more fodder is produced for winter feeding, more cattle will pasture in the hills adjoining. This also means more people in that vicinity, more towns and villages, and this means a larger market, not only for the farmers' products, but for everything that is produced by the brain or muscle of man. I have gone across the continent; I have gone into the irrigated regions of Wyoming and Montana, Utah and Colorado, and the things there used all come from the East. There are no manufactories to speak of in arid America. The wagons, the planters, the plows, the harness, and the saddles, aye, the furniture in their houses, all comes from this side of the one hundredth meridian of longitude. I have seen the trade-mark of a Wisconsin firm on their wagons, of New York and Massachusetts manufacturers upon their clothing. The great saddles they rode in were made down in eastern Nebraska or farther East.

Some gentlemen from the grand old "Keystone" State oppose this bill, but let me call their attention to what some of the strongest and most influential of the press in the country and located in Pennsylvania say right in this line. First, I read from an editorial in the Philadelphia Inquirer of a recent date on the subject "For the irrigation of the arid lands:"

> Only one argument against this legislation has ever been seriously advanced, which is that its effect would be to intensify the already sharp competition against which the Eastern farmer is obliged to contend. There is very little force or merit in that objection. In the first place it would be difficult to prove that the Eastern farmer would be in the slightest degree affected, and even if he were that would be no reason why a work of national benefit should not be undertaken. An enforcement of the same reasoning would have nipped the national expansion in the bud.
> The irrigation of the arid West is an improvement of the greatest importance, whose inception has already been delayed too long. It is gratifying to know that there is a present prospect of its early realization.

I also have here an article from the Philadelphia Press, a part of which reads as follows:

> There are always vital considerations against a new departure like this that should be carefully weighed before the decisive step is taken. There is, however, one objection made to the irrigation bill that we can not respect. It is urged in the minority report, and it is elaborated and insisted upon by Congressman SIBLEY, of this State, in opposing the bill. It is that it is unjust to Eastern farmers for the United States to add millions of acres of productive lands to our national possessions and thereby "diminish the value of the present farming lands throughout the Union."
> This is an old argument. It was used by the mossbacks of one hundred years ago against every proposition to develop our then Western territory beyond the Alleghenies and to improve the means of communication between the East and West. It was used as an argument against the Louisiana purchase, which added millions of acres of productive land to the national domain. The theory of this class of objection is that the greater the country, the larger the area of its productive land, the poorer each individual farmer must be. A single oasis in an enormous unproductive desert would be the ideal happy land for such people.
> We do not believe that any considerable number of Eastern farmers are so ignorant as to be influenced by such arguments. If he who makes two blades of grass grow where one grew before is a public benefactor, then is not a government an enormous benefactor to its people if it changes waste lands into blooming gardens and fruitful fields and adds so much to our productive territory that the United States, which is already producing enough to feed itself and a part of Europe, shall become the granary of the world?

How much more time have I, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Three minutes.

Mr. BURKETT. Something has been said here about the competition that will come to the Eastern farmer, and I wanted to refute the argument somewhat. I should liked to have gone into that matter further. But, sir, let me close now with this one thought: The people of this country are pushing out for markets. That entire region is a market for the products of humid America, and in turn they ask us to take only their gold for money and their cattle to fatten; neither of which is competition for an Eastern farmer—the one he can not and the latter he would not. For it is more profitable to make cattle ready for market in the East than it is to produce them.

Agricultural America is the market place for manufacturing America. Ohio and Pennsylvania find markets for their manufactured wares in the Mississippi and Missouri valleys. We want to give them still more territory. We want markets. We have gone around the word in quest of markets. Markets! markets! has been the watchword of the Republican party ever since it raised its head in the cradle of liberty for the protection and betterment of mankind. We have protected home markets and have sought out new ones abroad. We have sent American consuls into every capital in the world to look up markets. The English lord dines on corn-fed beef from the valleys of the Ohio and the Missouri instead of Southdown mutton exclusively. Our American hog has marched triumphantly up the streets of Berlin—I believe he does have to carry with him a certificate of cleanliness and good health, but then he goes just the same. We have expended untold millions to develop markets for American products. We have sent Old Glory around the world on a mission of mercy and civilization. We will keep it there for those two good reasons, and incidentally we hope it may help our Eastern trade.

But, sirs, I ask you, is Asiatic trade better than trans-Mississippi trade? Would you rather sell a wagon, my friend from Wisconsin, in China than in Colorado? Would you, my friend from Ohio, where you make good bridges, would you rather sell a bridge in Egypt than in Wyoming? Would you, my Pennsylvania friend, prefer making engines and railroad iron for Russia and England and Jerusalem than for Utah, Montana, California, Wyoming, Kansas, and Nebraska?

Gentlemen, this question of irrigation must be met. Governmental aid must come and it will come. The Government owns the lands and upon them there are collectible no taxes for State purposes. The entire revenue from these lands goes into the Federal Treasury, and I believe it is the duty of the Government to help reclaim them, at least to the extent of revenue derived from them. The pending bill provides for no more and it could ask for no less. It is an important measure to the West, but it is even more so to the East. What people are out there can live, but, sirs, if the country is to be settled up and become of any value to the East, some such measure as this must pass. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. REEDER. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized in favor of the pending amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent that I may have ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, some reference has been made to the influences prevailing in favor of this measure. I challenge the advocates of this bill to show that the principal promotion is not by the great railroads of the Northwest. Look in your mail of this morning. See the speech of James J. Hill, president of the Great Northern Railway Company, delivered June 4 in Chicago, and read its statements for proof. Read the discussion and statements appended by the gentleman from Nevada a few days ago, and tell me if the railroads are not the principal promoters of this measure.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (continuing). I only need to cite a synopsis of the address of Mr. Hill, at Chicago, on commercial expansion:

Part of the railroads in building up the country—Their property bound up with that of the people they serve—Powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission—Danger of additional powers suggested—Railroads helping to capture for America the commerce of the Orient—Combination of capital needed—Law now to control the only dangerous trusts—Irrigation needed to enlarge the public domain.

So, from all the discussion, tracts, and public documents, every one that lifts up his head as a specialist on irrigation shows that the great railroad combinations are the promoters of this bill. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has presented an amendment which seeks to save the agricultural colleges of every State of the Union from the attempt made by irrigation projectors to destroy them altogether.

Among the active promoters of this colossal undertaking we find the proverbial—the good, the bad, and indifferent.

The land-grant subsidized railroads—submerging the mainspring of their action, the increase of the value of their land subsidy—urge as a principal reason for it that it will furnish products for our expanding trade in the Orient, and thereby, of course, arguing that it will not adversely affect the farmers of other States.

An argument for trade expansion in Asia now from a political standpoint is an argument for territorial expansion in the Philippines. It does not require a careful observer of political events to discern the effect of the Government going out of its way, at a great expense, fitting these lands for culture to aid in the exploitation of China and the Orient; but how will you explain to the farmers of your States, whose only protection against these new fields forced open by irrigation at their expense is the railroad charge levied against them when they seek to get their products to the place of competition?

As stated by General GROSVENOR, it forecloses any future endowment of agricultural and mining colleges of States in the only way it can safely and constitutionally be done—out of the public-land fund. Each of the State colleges now receives out of the public-land fund, under the so-called Morrill Act of 1890, $25,000 per annum, and for agricultural experiment stations, under the act of 1887, each State receives annually out of this fund an additional $15,000.

A bill introduced this session by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] was recently favorably reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] giving an additional sum of from $10,000 to $20,000 to the respective State colleges to promote agriculture and mining.

This measure has the support of our college presidents, our State agricultural societies, and the International Mining Congress, all of whom have sent us petitions earnestly asking us to secure its passage.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me right there?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I must first yield to the gentleman from Colorado. I will yield to both gentlemen later on.

PURDUE UNIVERSITY, PRESIDENT'S OFFICE,
Lafayette, Ind., April 3, 1902.

Hon. J. M. ROBINSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter of March 29, in which you inquire particularly as to the possible benefits to Indiana of the passage of the bill creating schools of mines and mining, I would say, as I pointed out in my previous letter, this would enable Purdue to establish a school of mines and mining by providing for instruction in all of the subjects specially required in such a school, while utilizing the equipment and instructors which we already have for the teaching of such subjects as mathematics, physics, chemistry, drawing, shop practice, etc. In effect, it would give the State the benefit of a fully equipped school of mines, which would otherwise cost a large sum to establish, but which under these conditions could be had at a total additional cost of from $10,000 to $15,000 per annum.

Now, as to the value to the State of such a school: It would enable us to train young men in the science and technology relating to the exploration and development of such very important industries to the State as depend upon its resources in the way of coal, building stone, oil, gas, cement, and clay, which, next to the farming lands, are the most extensive and most valuable interests of the State. I think there can be no doubt but that the intelligent training of men for these particular industries will react to the benefit of the State. Moreover, the establishment of such a school will, under the terms of the bill, enable us not only to train students as indicated, but also to carry on research, make analyses, and publish results free for the use of the citizens of the State.

Very respectfully,

W. E. STONE, President.

INDIANA STATE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE,
Indianapolis, Ind., February 1, 1902.

This is to certify that at regular meeting of the Indiana State board of agriculture, held at the statehouse in Indianapolis, at which all the members were present, the following resolutions were introduced by Hon. Mason J. Niblack, seconded by Mr. David Wallace, and unanimously adopted, to wit:

"Whereas the acts of Congress of 1862, 1887, and 1890, establishing and aiding colleges and agricultural and mechanical arts, and agricultural experiment stations in the various States of the Union, have resulted in such usefulness to the productive industries of the country; and

"Whereas in our own State of Indiana the benefits of this legislation, as demonstrated by the work of Purdue University, have been exceptionally great:

"Resolved by the Indiana State board of agriculture, That the bill now pending in Congress, known as H. R. 8375, proposing to enlarge the field of usefulness of the land-grant colleges by establishing in them departments of instruction and research in mining, forestry, agricultural engineering, etc., has our strongest indorsement and approval, and that this body requests the Senators and Representatives from Indiana to give the same their active support.

"Resolved, That the secretary of this board be instructed to transmit to each Senator and Representative from Indiana a certified copy of these resolutions."

A true copy.

CHAS. DOWNING, Secretary.

THE UNIVERSITY OF KANSAS,
DEPARTMENT GEOLOGICAL SURVEY,
Lawrence, January 25, 1902.

DEAR SIR: At the fourth annual meeting of the International Mining Congress held last July at Boise City, Idaho, a resolution was unanimously adopted memorializing Congress to make an appropriation for the establishment and maintenance of mining schools, or mining departments, in the several States and Territories of the Union. A committee on legislation was appointed to present the matter to Congress. This committee begs leave to submit a few thoughts germane to the subject.

First. For more than forty years it has been the policy of the Federal Government to assist State educational institutions by the establishment of State universities and State colleges of agriculture and mechanic arts, and subsequently by establishing the agricultural experiment stations which are now supported by annual appropriations.

The passage of this bill will not only cut off any future endowment of our colleges, but in a few years' operation it will be found to have effectually, by the force of circumstances, destroyed all bounty to them from the national source, except it be granted by a direct appropriation out of the United States Treasury.

This method will always be deemed unwise, and I believe unconstitutional, the constitutionality of which action is at least a question not yet satisfactorily settled in view of the recent upheavals on constitutional construction. This bill, drafted exclusively in favor of its irrigation objects, shrewdly provides that irrigation shall be on the safe side of the question, and makes the fund for its promotion out of the sale of public lands, leaving our agricultural and mineral colleges to the doubtful expedient of running counter to a strong sentiment and constitutional construction and getting their money by a direct appropriation from the United States Treasury if by reason of the depletion of the fund by arid-land projects it shall be found insufficient to supply our State colleges.

This bill affects us all adversely who are outside the arid sections. It is no more selfish in us to claim a cordial and continuing support of our splendid agricultural and mineral colleges of our States. Let us have a use of our public lands at home. They tell us they are legislating for our people. We are satisfied with the legislation we have already with the funds of thousands that we receive for our colleges from the sale of public land, and with the continuing appropriations which are bound to come to us if you do not destroy, for your own selfish benefit, the source of its supply.

We do not need the legislation that you propose in the great work our State colleges are doing to equip competent men to develop our agricultural resources and the products of our mines. You strike a blow at the heart of our established systems and you ask us to pull down the pillars of the temples in which we live and thrive and flourish.

Last year, out of the sale of public land, we drew from the fund of the United States, which you seek to divert, $1,200,000 for our colleges, and the additional sum of $720,000 for experimental work in agriculture and mining. In this way all get a benefit from the land that belongs to all.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does not the bill first provide——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I must yield first to the gentleman from Colorado and then to the gentleman from Georgia, and then I will yield to the gentleman from Nevada.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the gentleman yield to me now?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No; I can not.

If the Government, by unusual and expensive means and experiments, is to go out of its way to control utilities and lands, and laws and powers of States too weak to rule themselves, I would think the power could as well be used and exercised for the building of good roads throughout the States, for the reclamation of swamp and lake lands in the States, and my section will furnish a field for this, where I can promise more land reclaimed for a less cost to the United States Government than can be found in the provisions of this bill. But, sir, the people of Indiana will not forfeit their State prestige by asking for it, and we will not ask you to expand the "general-welfare" clause to grant it, living and abiding in the hope that we may never surrender the powers and rights of our State by supplicating for this unheard of and doubtful Federal benefaction.

By the joint action of legislatures of Indiana and Illinois we reclaimed untold thousands of acres of land, and I commend the strength and virtue of these two legislatures to my friends as an evidence of concert of action by States in needed improvements. Counties by joint action drain thousands of acres of waste land, as your land will be watered when the needs and demands enforce the action. It is a confession of impotency in State government or lack of virtue in legislatures to ask the Federal Government to take charge of the polity and administration of State affairs.

Mr. Chairman, it is a measure deflecting immigration from the Southern States, to which it is going now, and sends it to States to the lands of which are to be added this value by this unconstitutional and dangerous measure. Now, I will yield to the gentleman from Colorado for a question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to what he was stating at the time I interrupted him.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I recollect it perfectly well. I hope the gentleman will make his question short.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The gentleman stated the promotion of this matter was by the railroads, and I want to ask the gentleman whether or not he thinks there was any railroad influence that had its influence upon the delegates of the Republican and Democratic national conventions that made them indorse the measure that was put into those platforms.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I stated yesterday that the gentleman's bill and report providing for cession of lands to States was the only measure before those conventions, and that those conventions well might have had his proposition before them, as it was the only one before the Congress.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want to say to the gentleman that——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman can make his explanation in his own time. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I am interested in the effect that this bill and this amendment will have on the matter proposed, and on the agricultural colleges and the experimental stations. I do not want to take the gentleman's time, but I do want information. I want to know if this bill passes without some express provision in it like that offered by the gentleman from Ohio, what will be the effect on the agricultural colleges and its experimental stations? I know the gentleman from Indiana can make it clear.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. This irrigation bill provides, from line 8 to line 20, page 2:

That in case the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands other than those realized from the sale and disposal of lands referred to in this section are insufficient to meet the requirements for the support of agricultural colleges in the several States and Territories, under the act of August 30, 1890, entitled "An act to apply a portion of the proceeds of the public lands to the more complete endowment and support of the colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, established under the provisions of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862," the deficiency, if any, in the sum necessary for the support of the said colleges shall be provided for from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BARTLETT. Suppose there is this deficiency, and it becomes necessary to provide for agricultural colleges, and Congress is to make the appropriation, it rests upon the will of Congress when proposed as to whether it will make that appropriation or not.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes; but Congress has refused to make appropriations directly out of the public Treasury for projects like this, as it has always refused to make appropriations, many millions of which could be used for good roads and the reclamation of swamp lands, of which I have many in my district.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Is the gentleman aware that ever since the passage of the act providing for agricultural colleges appropriations for these colleges have been made out of the general Treasury, and that——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Hold on; that is one question.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me complete my question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] has expired.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, we shall object to that.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to ask——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I heard the gentleman's first question.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask the gentleman whether it is not a fact that when the Oklahoma free-home bill was passed, the agricultural colleges were solicitous regarding their existence; and that danger was guarded against, just as it is in this bill, by the insertion of a provision that if there should be any deficiency in the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, the deficiency should be made up out of the public treasury. Now, is the gentleman aware that the agricultural colleges have had a committee here during this winter, and that that committee has been in conference with us with respect to the shape of this provision, and that they are absolutely satisfied with it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Allow me to state that I am the author of the bill referred to, and the friends of that bill are not in favor of this bill. They are afraid that the effect of this bill will be to destroy the possibility of any further aid to the agricultural colleges.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The gentleman is speaking of a bill with which we are not now concerned—a bill which has not yet come up.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I hope the gentlemen will not take up my time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will secure additional time for the gentleman.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman from Nevada was about to object to an extension of my time for five minutes, so I hope this interruption will not result in my losing the time I am now entitled to.

Mr. GROSVENOR. This bill provides—

The deficiency, if any, in the sum necessary for the support of said colleges shall be provided from money in the Treasury—

When? When some Congress sees fit to make the provision out of the Treasury. That is all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is the provision I read.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does the gentleman from Ohio deny my statement that the agricultural colleges are satisfied with this bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do. The Ohio State University is protesting against this bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Now, will the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] be kind enough to listen to my answer to his three questions? In form, the appropriation may be made out of the general fund; in fact, the provision is to be made effective and constitutional by providing that the money shall come out of the funds derived from the sale of the public lands, which has always been the result.

Now, in reference to the gentleman's third question, let me say that the committee is not agreed as to this matter, nor is the college committee satisfied with this emasculating provision in the form presented.

In the hubbub I have forgotten the second question of the gentleman. Will he repeat it? I will yield to him for that purpose.

A MEMBER. It was about Oklahoma.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes; in reference to Oklahoma; the gentleman may say what he pleases on that subject, and if it is borne out by the record I will admit it. I am not one of those narrow men who would submerge all the interests to one idea or one measure. I am not one of those who would look straight ahead at only a single interest, at the risk of others important. I believe, as a Democrat and as a patriot, that we ought to admit as States the three Territories. I stood up for that proposition here, waiving the question of irrigation, because there were other considerations which more than counterbalanced that. But if you pass this irrigation bill, I believe that it will send those three Territories in their hope for statehood into gloomy darkness for ten or twenty years to come.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota rose.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman state how long, in his opinion, there will be sufficient proceeds from the sale of these public lands to make good these appropriations to agricultural colleges unless something be done to reclaim the remaining portions of our public domain?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The statements of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] favoring the additional appropriation proposed by the bill of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] for these great and meritorious objects show the amount of money now derived from that source; and this measure would consume the entire fund.

I do know that the Land Office has run behind at times and in funds as an institution of the Government. I do know that they are promoting this measure in order to save their jobs and get new ones for others. I do know that it will not be very many years that this fund can be provided for the support of our colleges. But I believe the people are willing to surrender their rights, if it comes in the usual course of events, if they have any, with respect to direct appropriations from the public Treasury, rather than pretend that they are doing good to all our people by creating lands at a cost of $10 an acre to be purchased by the poor people of our country. Categorically, I do not know exactly, is my answer to the gentleman's question as to the time that the funds for colleges will run out unless irrigation is provided for.

Those of course are favoring it who in official departments and bureaus are specialists—specialists of the arid and irrigation variety, good men and wise, but nevertheless specialists—and they have labored exclusively, sedulously, and unremittingly to secure its success. They have trod the straight and narrow pathway, looking neither to the right nor to the left, but straight ahead, with but a single hope and ambition—its ultimate success.

Others in official life outside of Congress follow closely along who have expectation of promotion for themselves or preferment for others, and these are no inconsiderable force.

I was never so forcibly reminded of the charge of the Light Brigade as when it become known that I was opposed to this bill as untimely, unwise, and injudicious. They have flooded us with public documents and discussions that Congress unwisely, in my judgment, gave them the power to inflict upon us.

I exclude, of course, in referring to "promotion," representatives of constituencies who are working for their people, as I work for mine. I applaud their efforts. If they get two score votes on this floor from States unaffected by the special interest involved, they will be entitled to the best crown of glory for their achievements.

This bill involves in large measure immigration—whether we shall adopt a remedy complete and loudly called for by the very interest, labor, for the ills to which you say this is a panacea—for the evils complained of.

By shutting out the great hordes of immigrants from Japan and from the south and east of Europe, who come not to make good citizens for a generation or two, but to lower the scale of wages and living and to eat out the substance of our people and desirable immigrants from the north and west of Europe, you at once divert the argument for more public land of all its force and strength. I see in this legislation an opening up for and an encouragement of those undesirable classes from Japan, the Philippines, and from the south and east of Europe, too many of whom already abound and who are driving out American labor on the Western coast.

The gentleman from Nevada is, as he should be, for Nevada against the world. In all things and at all times he has been her faithful and able representative. He has accomplished for her all that could be accomplished, and none has done more for his constituency.

But his task is difficult, and I am reminded of a picture of Atlas with the world on his shoulders, and see a parallel of the gentleman with Nevada on his shoulders, heavy in land, but light in people. But how can he ask us to give up our interests to serve her exclusively? A Republican has proclaimed through the press, if he is properly quoted, that all the Democrats are favorable. Announcements like this may have emanated from this side, but I doubt it, for it has no foundation in fact, and it bears a suspicious resemblance to an attempt to bunco and frighten both sides by a political dream or hobgoblin that exists nowhere in the realm of politics or on the floor of the House.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address myself to the amendment presented by the gentleman from Ohio, the purpose of which is to defeat the bill. The gentleman from Ohio proposes to amend the first section of this bill, which provides that the receipts from the sales of public lands in the arid region, comprising thirteen States and three Territories, shall be set apart in the Treasury as a reclamation fund for the construction of irrigation works, by striking out the following proviso:

Provided, That in case the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands other than those realized from the sale and disposal of lands referred to in this section are insufficient to meet the requirements for the support of agricultural colleges in the several States and Territories, * * * the deficiency, if any, in the sum necessary for the support of said colleges shall be provided from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

And inserting in lieu thereof the following:

But no part of the proceeds of sales of public lands required to carry into full effect the provisions of the act of August 30, 1890, entitled "An act to apply a portion of the proceeds of the public lands to the more complete endowment and support of the colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts established under the provision of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862," shall be so set apart or diverted to such irrigation fund.

Now, gentlemen, what will be the effect of this amendment? Its effect will be to make all agricultural colleges a charge upon the receipts of the public lands of the arid region. The receipts from that region now aggregate nearly $3,000,000 annually and as the appropriations for the agricultural colleges amount to about $1,000,000 annually, and the amount which would be used for irrigation under this bill will be reduced, if the gentleman's amendment is carried, to less than $2,000,000 annually.

This is upon the assumption that all the humid public lands outside of the arid and semiarid States will soon be disposed of and that the sales of the future will be made only in the arid and semiarid region.

HOW AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES ARE SUPPORTED.

Now, we all know that the original legislation regarding the agricultural colleges provided that the annual allowance should come from the proceeds of the sales of public lands, but, as a matter of fact, no special fund in the Treasury was made of the receipts of the sales of public lands, and it has been the custom of Congress to make annual appropriations for the agricultural colleges from the General Treasury.

This custom will doubtless continue even when the entire public domain is disposed of, for I take it for granted that the Congress of the United States will support these agricultural colleges out of the public Treasury after the land funds are exhausted just as it has been supporting the Agricultural Department, the experiment stations, the Bureau of Soils, the Bureau of Animal Industry, the Geological Survey, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and other scientific branches of the Government, and they will do it under the general-welfare clause of the Constitution, which permits almost any legislation that is for the benefit of the country at large.

We all know that the area of the public domain has been greatly diminished in the humid States; that all lands which are watered by the heavens either have been or are being taken up by settlers, and that the public lands in the humid region will soon be exhausted. If, then, the agricultural colleges should remain dependent upon the proceeds of the sale of public lands they will shortly be without revenue, for the bulk of the public domain now lies in the arid region, and it is almost worthless. It will be worthless to the agricultural colleges, it will be worthless to the Government, it will be worthless to the States, and it will be worthless in every sense unless this work of reclamation is commenced. So that these lands constitute no valuable asset of that fund unless the very work of reclamation contemplated by the act is done.

Now, what have we done to secure the future of these agricultural colleges? Why, when the Oklahoma free-homes bill came up, several years ago, and it was proposed to turn over millions of acres to settlers without imposing upon them even the charge which was paid for the lands to the Indian tribes, the agricultural colleges, fearing that their appropriations would be endangered, appealed to Congress to protect them, and the result was that with the consent of both sides of the House, a provision was inserted in the Oklahoma free-homes bill similar to the one inserted in this bill, that if at any time the proceeds from the sales of public lands should be insufficient to meet the requirements for the support of the agricultural colleges, the deficiency, if any, should be made up out of the general Treasury, so we have already legislation protecting the agricultural colleges—they are already fastened upon the Federal Treasury—and it is only excess of caution which requires any provision protecting them in this bill. They are already protected for all time.

THE MINING SCHOOLS.

I wish to say on behalf of the Irrigation Committee that its members have been in communication with a committee of five appointed by the agricultural colleges to take care of their interests in Congressional legislation and to secure additional legislation for mining schools in connection with them. This committee has been here urging Congress to provide for a school of mines in every State in the Union and for an appropriation of $10,000 annually for this purpose, to be gradually increased until it should reach $20,000 annually, and the bill which they have urged provided in terms that this appropriation should be a charge upon the proceeds of the sale of public lands.

I myself have held frequent conferences with them, and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has held frequent conferences with them. We stated to them that while we were friendly to the organization of mining schools by national legislation, we could not, in the interest of the arid region, permit any diminution of the fund required for the reclamation of arid land, and while we were willing to make these mining schools a charge upon the public lands outside of the arid region, we were opposed to any measure which would enable them to absorb the proceeds of the sales in the arid region, essential as they are to its development.

We came to an agreement with them, and the agreement was that they should make their bill simply a charge upon the proceeds of the sales of public lands outside of the arid region. As a result of our agreement the friends of the mining-school bill and the friends of the irrigation bill have very generally signed a petition to the Committee on Rules asking that a time be fixed for the consideration of the mining-school bill with an amendment eliminating from their support the proceeds of the sales of public lands in the arid region and making them a charge upon public lands in the humid States only.

I am assured—we have all been assured—that the representatives of the agricultural colleges are satisfied with the provisions of this bill. They have uniformly assured us that they are in favor of an irrigation bill for the development of the West, and I have no reason to doubt their sincerity. Now, this mining-school bill was introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and it was favorably reported by the Committee on Mines. The gentleman from Ohio has referred to this bill, and I have no doubt the agricultural colleges would like to have it passed, and I am in favor of it in its modified form.

I am in favor of making appropriations to these mining schools out of the Federal Treasury. I believe that the organization of mining schools will be sanctioned by the general-welfare clause of the Constitution. I can not conceive any reason why appropriations for such schools intended to advance, develop, and promote the mining interests of the country should not be as legitimate a subject of national legislation as the Agricultural Department, as the Bureau of Soils, as the experiment stations, as the Geological Survey. The fact is that the mining schools can be incorporated with these departments, and particularly with the Geological Survey, and the two can be so interrelated as to be of a vast advantage in the development of the country.

The public lands owned by the Government are largely mining lands. Their property development depends upon scientific knowledge as well as practical experience. If the agricultural and commercial development of the country is a legitimate subject of national legislation there is no reason why the mining development should not be, and these schools form an essential part of such development. If brought into cooperation with the Geological Survey they will be in touch with the mines of every part of the Union, and thus the experience of the developed part may become available for the undeveloped part.

But it is unnecessary to go into the question of the mining schools now. That will be a matter of future legislation, and I hope the proposed bill, amended as agreed, will be passed. The only question now before us is whether the agricultural colleges are protected by this bill, and I insist that they are; that they are by this bill and the Oklahoma free-homes bill made a charge upon the general Treasury, and that it is as proper to make them a charge upon the Federal Treasury as the Agricultural Department and the scientific bureaus. And if this is denied, I insist upon it that the proceeds from the sale of public lands have been accumulating in the public Treasury for years, and that if they are put together they will be sufficient for the support of the agricultural colleges for an hundred years.

So that, even assuming that the agricultural colleges are entirely dependent upon the proceeds of the sales of public lands, and there is no constitutional sanction for their support from the taxation of the country, I insist upon it that there are funds in the Treasury amply available for this purpose.

EXTENT OF POSSIBLE IRRIGATION.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman permit an interruption at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to ask the gentleman from Nevada if he can tell us how many acres of arid lands there are, how many acres of public lands, and how many that are not, so that we can form some idea of how much this fund will eventually be?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman that so far as the arid region is concerned there are in all 600,000,000 acres of land, mountain and valley land. Of these 600,000,000 acres, probably one-half or more is so high above the general level of water in the streams that it can not be reached by water diverted from the streams. Then besides only a small portion of the land within reach of the streams can be irrigated, because of insufficiency of water. You must recollect that the streams in that region are fed from the snows of the mountains and that these snows are limited both in area and depth.

It is estimated that only one-tenth of the arid region is reclaimable, and it will take fifty or one hundred years to do that. Some idea of the time that will be taken can be derived from the fact that thus far in a period of fifty years only 7,500,000 acres have been irrigated by private enterprise. It is estimated, therefore, by the officers of the Geological Survey and by the State irrigation engineers and other competent men that of the whole 600,000,000 acres of public land now existing in the arid region only 60,000,000 acres are reclaimable. Sixty million acres means a space equal to that occupied by the States of Iowa and Illinois, or the single State of Colorado.

AGRICULTURAL COMPETITION.

Now, when you reflect that during the last fifty years we have not only opened up the States of Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, the two Dakotas, Minnesota, and Wisconsin, and that we did all this when our population was much less than it is now, you can form some idea of how small the agricultural competition of the future will be as compared with the agricultural competition of the past. In addition to this you must recollect that the products of that region are different from the products of the Mississippi and Ohio valleys. The wheat and corn of the Mississippi and Ohio valleys will be bought by the people of the arid region for food for themselves and for fattening their cattle.

Already the States of Kansas, the two Dakotas, and Nebraska find a considerable part of their business in supplying the arid region with corn, and so their product goes now to the West, to the arid region, instead of to the East in competition with Iowa, Missouri, and Illinois. With the development of the arid region, the increase of the mining development, and the increase of the business of fattening cattle there will be an enlarged market for the products of the Mississippi and Missouri valleys instead of a lessened market. That this is so is demonstrated by the fact that the Representatives from the two Dakotas, Kansas, and Nebraska, the States nearest the arid region, and the most likely to be injured, if there should be injurious competition, are in favor of the development of the arid region. They know that that development means the prosperity of their region, not its injury.

Mr. BARTLETT. You do not ask to take any other money except that arising from the sale of those very lands?

Mr. NEWLANDS. We do not propose to take anything except the proceeds of the sale of public lands in the arid and semi-arid region, composed of 13 States and 3 Territories. We propose in this way that the West shall reclaim itself without calling upon the Federal Treasury, though I claim that the development of the public domain is as legitimate a charge upon the public treasury as any other measure relating to the public welfare.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is there any other means of increasing the value of those arid lands except by irrigation?

Mr. NEWLANDS. None whatever, and the Government itself must make these waters available; no one else can, for no one else has the capacity to do it. The owner of this vast public damain, whoever it is, must do the work, and unless the Government rids itself of ownership by granting this great public domain to some corporation, it must go on with the work. Should the Government grant these lands to corporations, it would absolutely abrogate the trust it holds for the entire people. No greater outrage could be effected.

LAND MONOPOLY.

We have not felt in this country the evils of land monopoly. Lord Macauley said we never would experience the test of our institutions until our public domain was exhausted and an increased population engaged in a contest for the ownership of land. That will be the test of the future, and the very purpose of this bill is to guard against land monopoly and to hold this land in small tracts for the people of the entire country, to give to each man only the amount of land that will be necessary for the support of a family—not more than 80 acres in the southern part of the arid region and not more than 160 acres in the northern part, where cultivation is less intensified. Convey this land to private corporations and doubtless this work would be done, but we would have fastened upon this country all the evils of land monopoly which produced the great French revolution which caused the revolt against church monopoly in South America, and which in recent times has caused the outbreak of the Filipinos against Spanish authority.

STATE CESSION.

Nothing can be accomplished by conveying this land to the States. The State lines are arbitrary lines, not drawn with reference to the watersheds, but arbitrarily by the surveyors, straight north, south, east, and west. Were these States so bounded that each could compose an entire watershed, with all its tributaries, then it would be possible to cede all the public domain to the States with the expectation of some just and proper result, but a river, with all its tributaries, may reach into four or five States. Scientific reclamation requires conservation regardless of State lines. The lands for reclamation may be in one State, bounded by arbitrary lines, and the work of conservation of the waters necessary for the reclamation of its arid land may have to be done in another.

HYPOCRISY OF "STATE CESSION."

And right here upon the question of State cession, let me ask how the opponents of this bill, who are endeavoring to defeat its operation by withdrawing from the reclamation fund such portion of the receipts from the sales of public lands as is necessary to support the agricultural colleges, can justify themselves by insisting upon State cession as preferable to the provisions of this bill?

Every man who has been endeavoring to defeat this bill by enlisting the friends of the agricultural colleges against it has also stated in the course of his argument that he would be in favor of ceding these lands to the States; and yet cession to the States will cause the agricultural colleges the loss of these receipts just as much as they will be lost to the agricultural colleges under this bill. Nothing can more clearly demonstrate the hypocritical character of the opposition to this bill on the part of those who profess friendship for the agricultural colleges than the demand that these lands should be ceded to the States, and that, too, without substituting the support of the General Treasury.

WILL KILL THE BILL.

I wish to emphasize that the adoption of this amendment will kill this bill, and that the very purpose of the amendment is to defeat it. This will not be the only amendment intended to kill this bill. Those opposed to this measure are prepared to offer many amendments, their purpose being to delay the consideration of this bill under the rule that has been adopted, knowing well that if this House adjourns to-day without final action the bill will be dead, and I appeal to the friends of the bill to vote down the amendment, put a limit for debate upon every amendment, and drive this bill through to a successful issue.

So far as this side of the House is concerned, I am glad to know that it has almost its unanimous support. It is true that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], a Democrat, has arraigned his party associates in regard to this bill, which has the unanimous support of the Democratic members of the Irrigation Committee, the support of the Democratic members of the Committee on Rules, and the approval of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, and which meets the demand of the Democratic party itself, declared in unequivocal terms in the platform of 1900.

I am glad to know that he stands almost alone on this side of the House in opposition to the bill. I stand as he does, as all this side does, against this expensive system of expansion which has involved the country in an expense of nearly $600,000,000 in a war of subjugation against a foreign people desirous of independence, and I had hoped that he would stand with his party in favor of domestic development as against foreign subjugation and growth by conquest, but the gentlemen on the other side of the House who oppose this bill are guilty of even greater inconsistency.

The leaders on that side—the men charged with the responsibility of party action—have been and are heartily opposed to this bill, and if this bill is to be carried it is to be carried against their opposition by the friends of irrigation in both parties. How amazing the inconsistency of these gentlemen! After spending nearly a billion of dollars in a war of perfidy and foreign conquest, they cry economy regarding domestic expenditures. They would expand the empire; they would dwarf the Republic.

They favor the demand for millions of expenditure in support of an army of conquest in the Orient; they give heed to a demand for millions of dollars for buying the lands of the friars in the Philippines in order to present them to the Filipino people, and yet they turn a deaf ear to the demands of this country, whose people by hundreds and thousands, the bone and sinew of the land, are now seeking homes in the public domain of Canada, and they deny this country the reasonable and just development essential to its welfare and the welfare of the unborn millions of the very States which they represent.

What would have been thought of Alexander Hamilton, the great leader of New York in the early days of the Republic, had he opposed the development of the country beyond the Alleghanies upon the ground that the farm competition would be disastrous to the interest of the farmers of New York? What would have been thought of Benjamin Franklin had he in his day taken the view that the prosperity of the farmers of Pennsylvania demanded that a limitation be put on the development of that country?

What would have been thought of the sturdy pioneers who drove their way through the Alleghenies into the forests and fields of Ohio, Illinois, and Iowa had they said: "We have now undisturbed possession of this portion of the public domain; let us stand firmly against the development of any other part?" What would have been thought of them had they selfishly opposed the development of Missouri, Nebraska, the Dakotas, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota?

And yet to-day the leading Representatives of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, and Iowa, occupying positions of power and influence on the majority side of the House, are actively and vigorously opposing the development and settlement of the arid West. Is it economy that controls them? How, then, could they favor the exemption of the Cuban people from about $7,000,000 annually in duties which otherwise would go into the Federal Treasury and pay their part of the Federal expenditures?

They eloquently spoke for magnanimity to Cuba, and yet they stand for injustice, illiberality, and indifference as to the wants and requirements of one-third of their own country—the wants and requirements of the people of numerous States brought into being by the act of the Federal Government and only lacking population because the Federal Government has neglected its duty with reference to its own domain and has refused to do the necessary and essential work for the conservation of the great water supply required for its settlement and population.

But time will not permit a lengthy argument, and I can only appeal to those who stand in sympathy with the development of the West to vote down this amendment which, in my judgment, is absolutely disastrous to the bill and which is intended to destroy it. Our time is short. Let us push this bill through, voting down all amendments, however specious, until we reach a triumphant conclusion.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is an attempt to defeat the bill by stampeding the House, by raising a bogy man, by attempting to frighten members who are interested in the agricultural colleges and the schools of mechanic arts into believing the revenues for the support of these institutions are in danger. There are no gentlemen on the floor of this House more interested in the agricultural colleges and the schools of mechanic arts than the gentlemen on the Committee on Irrigation, and that they are interested in those schools is indicated by the fact that in order that there might be no question relative to the funds for the support of those schools, out of an abundance of caution we reenact in this legislation a provision now upon the statute books and now protecting those schools and colleges.

When the so-called free-homes bill was under discussion here it was opposed by certain gentlemen interested in the agricultural colleges on the ground that to relieve the settlers from the payments on their lands would reduce the revenues from the sale of public lands, and possibly endanger the revenues of the agricultural colleges; and in order to quiet those fears, in order that there might be no question but what the necessary revenues should continue to flow to those colleges, there was written into that bill the following provision, in chapter 479, acts of the Fifty-sixth Congress. And I want the House to notice that we have written into this bill almost the exact language of the free-homes bill, as follows:

That in the event that the proceeds of the annual sales of the public lands shall not be sufficient to meet the payments heretofore provided for agricultural colleges and experimental stations by an act of Congress approved August 13, 1890, for the more complete endowment and support of the colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts—such deficiency shall be paid by the United States.

Mr. RAY of New York. May I ask you a question right there?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAY of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman from Wyoming be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAY of New York. It is true that you say here that if the funds provided by the sale of lands are not sufficient to carry on the irrigation schemes and also to sustain these schools, that then these schools shall be maintained out of other moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. MONDELL. I beg the gentleman's pardon. We do not say exactly that, though that is the purport of the provision.

Mr. RAY of New York. I beg pardon, but you do, or else I misread. Let me see:

Provided, That in case the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands other than those realized from the sale and disposal of lands referred to in this section——

Mr. MONDELL. Other than those realized from the sale and disposal of lands referred to in this section.

Mr. RAY of New York (reading):

are insufficient to meet the requirements for the support of agricultural colleges in the several States and Territories under the act of August 30, 1890, entitled "An act to apply a portion of the proceeds of the public lands to the more complete endowment and support of the colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, established under the provisions of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862," the deficiency, if any, in the sum necessary for the support of the said colleges shall be provided for from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, supposing that Congress at some future day should see fit to abandon these colleges to their fate; supposing that Congress should refuse to appropriate the money. Then they would have to close their doors, would they not? In other words, does not this bill in a certain contingency throw these colleges and schools upon the mercy of Congress?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think it does. The gentleman voted for the free-homes bill, I believe, which contains the same provision that this bill contains and made the agricultural colleges a charge upon the public Treasury as this bill does, providing there are not sufficient proceeds from the sale of public lands to provide for them. That is what this bill does, and that is what the free-homes bill did.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will you allow me? Do you hold that it is imperative that Congress shall make that appropriation?

Mr. MONDELL. I hold that the appropriation is made by this legislation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That it is a national appropriation—of how large a sum?

Mr. MONDELL. Of the amount provided in the original legislation—$25,000 per annum for each State and Territory, I think. I want to call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that when the agricultural colleges and schools of mechanic arts and experiment stations were costing upward of $1,500,000 per annum, and the net proceeds of the sale of public lands was a less sum per annum, the agricultural colleges and schools of mechanic arts received their funds without this legislation and without the free-homes legislation.

As a matter of fact, these appropriations have always been made out of the Treasury of the United States without any inquiry being made by the Treasury officials whether there was a sufficient sum received from the sale of public lands to pay them.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then the only difference here is that you will take away the fund from which normally they were to derive their support and push them over to the charity of Congress.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, if the gentleman wants to call it the charity of Congress, very well. What the gentleman wants to do, I understand, is this: That the arid West shall support the agricultural college of his State; that Nevada lands shall support the agricultural college in New York; that Wyoming's lands shall support the agricultural college in Pennsylvania. Now, the House has already passed on this question in the free-homes bill. The House has already provided that if the sale of public lands other than those derived from certain sources will not meet the requirements of agricultural colleges, then this fund shall come from the National Treasury, and these funds have been coming from the National Treasury.

Now, gentlemen, we do not pledge all the public lands to irrigation in this bill. There will remain about 367,000,000 acres of public lands from which funds for the support of the agricultural colleges may be derived. The proceeds of the public lands outside of the States and Territories named in this bill last year were over $600,000, not enough at the present time, I grant you, to provide for the schools and colleges, but I have no doubt but what the funds from this source will increase. But, gentlemen, what do we propose by this legislation? We ask not that any American citizen shall be taxed for the reclamation of the West. We simply ask that the public lands of that great region shall be pledged for the reclamation and development of that region.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point that debate upon this amendment is exhausted. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Is there not a pro forma amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There is not.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to hear the amendment read again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose that amendment is subject to amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is subject to amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I fancy I can offer an amendment by which I can get five minutes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given five minutes.

Mr. REEDER. I shall object to that, unless other gentlemen may be recognized.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move that all debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments shall be closed in ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, that is hardly a fair proposition. There has only been one amendment offered to this paragraph up to the present time, and there are many other amendments to be offered, and they ought to be understood.

Mr. HOPKINS. Has the gentleman any amendment to offer?

Mr. DALZELL. I have.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HOPKINS. I withdraw it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I call for the regular order, which is not debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois was recognized to offer an amendment to the amendment and is now preparing his amendment. The Chair does not feel like cutting him off from offering the amendment when he has not had an opportunity to do so.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask if a pro forma amendment is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. A pro forma amendment is in order.

Mr. CANNON. Then I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I must confess that I have not the knowledge of this bill that a Representative ought to have to fully discuss it in detail, and I find myself compelled to make an opinion as to the general merits of the proposition. Very generally we follow committees. There is a majority and a minority report here. Now, as I am advised at the present I stand ready to vote against the passage of this bill. I am inclined to think, if I understand it, that I stand ready to vote for this amendment. Let us see if I understand it. The bill devotes or appropriates all the public lands in the States mentioned for irrigation.

Mr. TONGUE. Except those devoted to school purposes.

Mr. RAY of New York. I beg pardon of the gentleman. He knows that it takes those devoted to school purposes also, in that provision, except the 5 per cent excepted.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I understand now that there are certain exceptions—5 per cent that pertain to the existing States that are not affected, and the school lands have been held unaffected, and if they are not selected, then the 5 per cent of the proceeds of the public lands granted to the States, they are not affected.

Mr. MONDELL. There is another; that is, the local land office fees are paid.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly; that does not amount to anything. Now, then, I understand that many years ago legislation was enacted that devoted from the proceeds of the sale of the public lands $25,000 annually to each agricultural college. How many there are I do not know; certainly 45, I take it; there may be 45, and probably will be more. That is in the nature of a mortgage, in one sense of the term, upon these particular lands, the public lands, that belonged to all the people when the legislation was had, practically in perpetuity for this purpose. It was thought wise to devote it to the agricultural colleges, because they had to do with agriculture. Congress years ago thought it wise to make this mortgage upon these lands in perpetuity, as I understand it.

This bill without the amendments put that charge practically upon the Treasury of the United States and relieves the public lands from that burden. It is true it does not affect the public lands in Alaska, and perhaps here and there other public lands, but substantially all the public lands that would produce a revenue are, by the proposed legislation, relieved from this mortgage that Congress put upon them to sustain the agricultural colleges. Now, I do not think it makes any difference to the agricultural colleges. I want to be square because the bill puts that charge directly upon the Treasury of the United States and relieves the public lands from that.

That brings me to another question. I rather think I shall vote for this amendment. I am content to let that charge rest there, and if this bill should pass, let them have for the purpose of this fund the proceeds of the public lands after the burden has been borne for the agricultural colleges.

Mr. MORRIS. What is the amount?

Mr. CANNON. From one million to twelve hundred thousand dollars per annum. Now, then, I wish I had it in my power to devise some machinery that would give every one of these States all these public lands, and allow each State to work out its own salvation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask that the gentleman be allowed five minutes more.

The gentleman from Wyoming asks that the gentleman from Illinois may have five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. It is a great extent of country. It contains forests, mines, mineral lands, plains, deserts, streams, and a small percentage of land that can be irrigated. The gentleman from Wyoming says from thirty-five to seventy-five million acres. I assume the latter figure is correct; that if all the water was fully utilized in the States mentioned it would probably be sufficient to irrigate 75,000,000 acres of land, and the estimate is that it will cost $10 an acre to make the reservoirs and the ditches, and that the settler will have to level the land and make the little irrigation ditches that would utilize the water. Ten dollars an acre, exclusive of this work by the settler, would make $750,000,000. It will some time be done. If I had my way about it, I would let this problem work itself out. As the population increases in the older States, as it becomes for the interest of the men to push out to make them new homes and reclaim these lands, they will do it as we have settled the balance of this country, guided by good brains, by the strength of the right arm of industry. I would rather it would be worked out in that way.

But let me come down to the exact thing I am afraid of. In the very inception of this bill it removes the charge of a million dollars a year upon these lands and puts it upon the Treasury.

Mr. BARTLETT. In addition to that there is $720,000 for experimental stations.

Mr. CANNON. Very well; perhaps I have got it too small. In the very inception I will assume that it is $1,000,000; in twenty-five years that is $25,000,000. Now, then, we could get along and let the Treasury bear that burden, but it is claimed by the gentlemen that all they want is their land, if the bill is passed, devoted to reservoirs and irrigation, and that they will work out their salvation. But before they can start this annual burden of from a million to twelve hundred thousand dollars is put on the Treasury.

That charge is a direct grant in this indirect way. Now, what I apprehend, and I would like to hear from my good friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and my good friend from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and my good friend from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] upon this subject. I apprehend that twelve months will not pass by until, by the aid of almost one-third of another body coming from the arid and semiarid States, at the other end of the Capitol, and the Representatives here, reenforced by transcontinental roads, reenforced by people who have got something to sell and develop—I am fearful they will come for a direct grant from the Treasury, possibly reimbursable from the sale of these lands, by which in the end we are to shoulder up, modestly speaking, $750,000,000 for this work, running through the years.

Now, I may be wrong about it. I would be glad to hear from the gentlemen I mentioned a moment ago whether in point of fact this is not a mere entering wedge——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Would the gentleman like an answer now?

Mr. CANNON. I yield first to my friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] the balance of my time to answer that question. If I had the time I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and my friend from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], because we are now getting at the very kernel of this contest. I want to know what we are voting for; and I would like for these gentlemen to speak up and tell us what they think about it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has said, and without attempting to answer him I want to say that I am in favor of this bill being passed, I am in favor of this bill being voted on, and I want to say to the men who stand here from the West, or from the South, or from other parts of the country, who want this bill to pass, that if you do not get a vote on this day your bill is dead. We have spent an hour in debating one paragraph. If 5 o'clock should come and there should be no quorum here and this House should adjourn without this bill being disposed of, then under the rule your bill is dead. I say to you, therefore, if we do not expedite this bill, if we spend the entire day in talking about it, you will never pass the bill.

Now, if the agricultural colleges——

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman will allow me to say that the special rule provides for a vote to-day whether the bill be read through or not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It does not fix the hour.

Mr. DALZELL. It provides that "at the end of two days"——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; it says that the bill shall be considered under the five-minute rule for two days——

Mr. CANNON. I should like to know how this matter stands.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would ask my friend on the Committee on Rules [Mr. DALZELL] whether he will agree that the debate on this bill, if not concluded sooner, shall conclude at 4 o'clock and the bill be reported to the House with the amendments?

Mr. DALZELL. So far as I am concerned, I should be perfectly satisfied with that course; but the rule provides that—

At the end of said two days a vote shall be taken.

That is irrespective of the question whether the bill has been read through or not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But we must finish the bill before we can report it to the House, and if we should lose a quorum this evening how could we report it to the House? To-morrow the bill would not be in order.

Mr. DALZELL. We could report it to the House under the rule, and it is specially provided that a vote shall be taken. The only danger that the gentleman runs at all is the danger of having no quorum; but there is no danger from protracted debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the bill is not voted upon to-day it will be dead.

Mr. DALZELL. That is true; but it will be voted on to-day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, as to the agricultural colleges, I simply want to say that the funds now derived from the sale of the public lands, irrespective of that portion derived from the sale of public lands in the arid-land States, are sufficient to-day to support the appropriations for the agricultural colleges and the experimental stations. There is no question that the funds thus derived are ample to-day and will be ample for some time in the future. Of course, there is a day coming in this country when all of the public lands will be disposed of, and you will derive no more revenue from the sale of the public lands for the support of the agricultural colleges. Of course, that day will be, to a small extent, expedited if you give this land for a particular purpose.

Mr. MADDOX. Does this bill take anything from the agricultural-college fund?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not anything, so far as the present day is concerned.

Mr. MADDOX. Will it in the future?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, as I said a moment ago, at some day in the far-distant future all the public lands will be sold, and therefore there will be no proceeds from the public lands to go to any agricultural colleges. That day may be fifty years hence or it may be a hundred years; but the day will come.

Mr. CLARK. And that would be the case if this bill were never passed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; that will ultimately happen, whether this bill becomes a law or not.

Mr. DINSMORE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] a question—one which I proposed to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. As I understand, this bill provides nothing to take any revenues from the sale of public lands outside of the arid districts in the States mentioned.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not a thing.

Mr. DINSMORE. What I want to be informed upon, if the gentleman knows—and if not, I would like some of these gentlemen of the arid West to tell us—is if there are to-day any public lands in that region open for settlement which do not have to be irrigated to make them salable for farming purposes?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. From my information on the question——

Mr. SHAFROTH. They are all arid.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will allow me, my information is that there is a very small portion of these lands that is open to homestead settlement. There is a large proportion of them that can be used for stock herding and stock raising, but those lands are usually used without being acquired from the Government. They are used by trespassers, and the only lands that the stock owners buy are the lands along the stream. That covers the water front, and then they go on pasturing their herds on the public lands, so in the present condition of those lands very little money will ever be derived from the sale of them for school purposes or any other purpose, but if this bill works out, and you go on and build these reservoirs, and you sell the lands that are adjacent to the reservoirs, and the money comes back into the fund, ultimately, if the scheme works out and is correct, you will have finished all the reservoirs and you will have your fund left that can be used for school purposes, and the only way you will get a fund out of these arid lands for the carrying on of the appropriations for these schools is in that way.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and pending amendments be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that all debate on the paragraph and pending amendments be now closed.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that that is rather ungracious in the gentleman, in view of the fact that the gentleman has occupied so much of the time, to thus cut off everybody else.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have occupied five minutes, and the paragraph has been debated for an hour and a half.

Mr. DALZELL. We ought certainly to have an opportunity to explain the amendments that we offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, that all debate on the paragraph and pending amendments be now closed.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that by striking out the word "paragraph" and leaving the word "amendments"—to close debate, in other words, on the amendments now pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to amend the motion of the gentleman from Alabama so that debate on the pending amendments to the amendment be now closed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I move as a substitute for that that all debate on this paragraph close in ten minutes. We have got to get along, or else we can not get a vote on the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. On the paragraph and amendments?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; on the paragraph and all amendments, that debate close in ten minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman that that is not fair, to close debate in that way on amendments.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The gentleman has admitted that if we do not get a vote on this measure to-day we are lost.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman has said expressly that you are bound to get a vote under the rule. It is specially provided for, and I do not believe that the gentleman will make any greater progress by choking off debate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The gentleman concedes that if there is no quorum here we could not get a vote, and then the gentleman concedes as a matter of fact that our measure is lost. It seems to me it is nothing but fair that the time be limited, and ten minutes seems to me to be fair. I do not want any of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado moves, as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, that all debate on pending amendments and the paragraph be closed in ten minutes.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. RAY of New York. I call for a division.

Several MEMBERS. It is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the Chair had announced the decision before the division was demanded.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that he heard some one calling for a division, but he did not see anyone standing.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the point of order.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 81, noes 33.

So the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute as amended.

The substitute as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I said I would not use the time. If any gentleman wishes to use it he can do so.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, under the order just made I shall not have an opportunity to say anything about an amendment that I propose to offer. So I will send the amendment up now, and say what I would say otherwise if I had the opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read for information in the time of the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 4, page 1, after the word "lands," insert "less the cost and expense of the administration and management thereof."

Mr. DALZELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to make remarks at any great length upon this bill. I simply desire to enter my protest in a public manner against its passage, a protest that I feel, however, will be unavailing.

This bill, in my judgment, violates all our previous notions as to the limitations of Federal power and all our theories as to the functions of the Government. It proposes to overrun State lines, to pay no attention to them; to supply Nevada, for instance, with water from California. It proposes even to overrun the boundaries of the United States. I find here a project for building a reservoir up somewhere in the mountains, the water to be carried across the United States line to Canada for 44 miles and back again into the United States.

Now, as I say, the bill violates all our previous notions as to Federal and international limitations. But in addition to that, it is unfair. Gentlemen say, "Why, this is a fair bill, because we are asking for nothing but what is our own;" and yet if I read the first paragraph of this bill aright, you will find that all the money paid into the Federal Treasury from the disposition of desert lands in the arid and semiarid States is to be turned over to the reclamation fund, while all the rest of the States are to be generously permitted to pay the expenses of administration and management of these same lands. Now, my amendment is intended to carry out what these gentlemen claim to be a fair construction of this bill—that the reclamation fund shall be only that which belongs to those States.

But, above all that, I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that this bill is simply an opening wedge to unlock the doors of the Treasury. We know what will happen in the future by what has happened in the past. Some years ago we passed a law generously giving to the agricultural colleges the proceeds of the public lands. We did that because we said, "This money is not the result of taxation. It is a sort of pocket-money fund belonging to the entire people, and we can devote it to any purpose that we see fit, and we can devote it to no better purpose than the educating of the young people of the country in agricultural pursuits."

What has been the result? No sooner does that fund begin to decrease than the parties who plausibly asked for the passage of the act in the first place come to Congress, and upon their demand Congress puts upon the statute book a law that relieves that fund and imposes the expense of maintaining these agricultural colleges upon the Federal Treasury.

Just so here; these gentlemen say now, plausibly, "Oh, it is only the fund arising from the sale of the arid lands that we want." But the fund arising from the sale of the arid lands will be a decreasing fund from this day forward, and it will not be long until we find that these same gentlemen will come to Congress and say, "Why, look at this great national work that we have undertaken. We are just in the midst of it. Are you going to allow the money heretofore expended to go to waste? Give us an appropriation from the Federal Treasury." And the result will be that this whole stupendous and extravagant scheme, involving an unlimited sum of money, will be settled upon the American people and paid out of general taxation.

Let me call your attention to a fact that must be fresh in the memory of many of you. Within four years the very gentlemen who are here to-day asking for this legislation said in your presence that it was impossible to believe that the United States Government would ever undertake this as a national scheme because of its immense cost, and yet because of the petitions that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] speaks of, coming from laboring organizations and the like, carefully manufactured and artificial public opinion, because of this worked-up sentiment, because of the industry of these gentlemen favoring this scheme, we find them here to-day, not asking that the States shall undertake this, not thinking it is an impossibility for the Federal Government to undertake it, but saying it is right and proper that this legislation should pass, and this great burden be placed on the shoulders of the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Chairman, I feel safe in saying to-day that no subject has been brought to the attention of Congress in recent years which bears so strongly and in so many ways on the future welfare and prosperity of our nation as does the subject we consider to-day. It is a subject so far-reaching and important in its influences as to cause its votaries to seem visionary to those who have given the subject but a casual consideration. But when the facts are known the feasibility of the project becomes apparent, though its magnitude has made us slow to grasp its tremendous possibilities of benefit to the whole people of the country.

A NEW HOMESTEAD LAW.

The question, in fact, is whether we shall enact a new homestead law which will be applicable to the vast area of arid public lands which remain unsettled, and which can not be settled until in some way water is brought within reach of those who seek homes on these lands.

The lands which are available for settlement under the old homestead law are practically exhausted, and yet the Government still owns two-thirds of the whole Western half of the United States—a territory embracing over 600,000,000 acres of land. The estimates of the area which can be reclaimed vary from 60,000,000 to 100,000,000 acres. Beyond a doubt the area is so large that if it were opened up for settlement opportunities would be created for our people who are without homes to get homes on the land for many years to come. No greater obligation could rest upon us than to see that such opportunities are afforded. No more beneficent law was ever enacted by Congress than the homestead law, and it comes in very bad grace for those who enjoyed the opportunities which it created to object now to continuing its benefits to others. We should see to it that every citizen of our country—every boy who has grown to manhood—who wants a home on the land should be able to get it so long as there remains any public land which can be made available for settlement.

CONDITIONS IN THE ARID REGIONS.

One of the difficulties to be overcome in bringing about a correct understanding of this question in the public mind arises from the fact that so few of our people as a whole are familiar with the natural conditions that exist in the West. They do not realize that unless the Government does adopt the national reclamation policy that we are urging that great region must and will always remain a desert. It can never be reclaimed either by the States or by private enterprise. We are face to face, then, with the proposition that the National Government must do it or that it must remain undone.

The States have not the financial resources and the experiments which have been made under the Carey Act, which granted a million acres to each State on condition only that it be reclaimed and settled, have demonstrated that the States are unable to cope with the problem.

The great rivers which will supply the water for the reclamation of this immense area of arid lands are interstate navigable streams. As Captain Chittenden has shown in his report on reservoir sites in Wyoming and Colorado, the streams which rise in those two States either flow through or border upon 17 different States and Territories. Reservoirs must be built in one State to furnish water for lands in another. Large interstate canals must be built crossing State boundaries and irrigating lands in both States. The great canal to take water from the Grand River for lands in both Colorado and Utah is an instance. The National Government alone can solve these interstate problems.

THE CREATION OF A COUNTRY.

The fact is, the carrying out of this new national policy for transforming our own arid region into a fertile and populous part of our national territory is just as much a national duty and just as much a national function as was the building of the great dikes of Holland. It is actually the creation of a new country, where nothing could exist unless the Government, as a great national undertaking, made the territory reclaimed habitable for man, so that population and everything that goes to make up a government could be brought into being. The sea would still be flowing over great areas of the richest and most fertile parts of Holland if the Government had not built the great dikes which now protect those lands from being submerged by the ocean.

In our case the situation is the same in principle. The limit of development by private capital has been very nearly reached. No private schemes can ever cope with the gigantic task of storing the floods of the Missouri, the Columbia, the Colorado, and the other great rivers of the West that now carry such immense volumes of water to waste in the ocean. These facts are well known to all who have studied the conditions in the West. They are the final conclusions of the Government itself as the result of investigations extending over more than a quarter of a century.

LANDS NEEDED FOR HOMES.

Anyone who thinks the time is not ripe for the reclamation by the Government of the arid region is blind to what is happening around him. No one would contend that these arid lands should be opened up for settlement unless the people needed them for homes. But there is not the slightest doubt that they are needed, and what would happen if they were opened up for settlement under the homestead law? Look at what has happened in Oklahoma. It has been well christened the Homestead State, for it is ready for statehood. In a little over ten years a Commonwealth of 400,000 people has grown up where was before that only a few Indians; and this has resulted in this incredibly brief period of time because the lands of Oklahoma were opened for homestead settlement and there was such a rush to secure these homes that when the lands were opened there was a great rush to occupy them. The recent opening of the Kiowa Reservation is familiar to all. There 160,000 homeseekers gathered to get a chance to draw lots for a home, when there were only 13,000 chances and less than one in ten could secure the coveted bit of land.

MIGRATION TO CANADA.

Now that Oklahoma has been taken up, we see this land-hungry horde steadily moving across the line into Canada. We are losing in this way our very best class of citizens. The sturdy energy which they will devote to the development of that inhospitable region under a foreign flag had far better be kept at home. Give these men who are going into Canada the opportunity they should have to develop the arid region of our own country, and they will do it instead of going to Canada and expatriating themselves.

In a recent interview Mr. J. A. Haslam, of Winnepeg, one of the largest landowners of Canada, stated that 50,000 Americans will move from the United States this year to northwest Canada.

The St. Louis Globe-Democrat recently said editorially:

> The movement of American farmers across the line into Canada's western territory is an argument in favor of reclaiming the lands in the arid region of the United States. These farmers would prefer to stay in their own country if the attractions for them seemed to be anything near so great as they are in Canada's Pacific domain. Canada there has millions of acres of wild land which can be got at a low price, and many Americans are among the persons who are taking it up. Of course, the throwing open of the big Indian reservations which are soon to be put on the market will absorb thousands of those homeseekers, but irrigation would do far more in this direction.

INCREASING POPULATION.

Another reason why we should begin the great work of reclaiming our arid lands for settlement is that our population is increasing so rapidly that it will not be possible to reclaim lands fast enough to keep pace with the increase of our population. We have now over 76,000,000 and in a little over thirty years we will have 150,000,000. In an address at Denver, Colo., on October 10, 1901, Hon. Lyman J. Gage, then Secretary of the Treasury, predicted that "fifty years from now the country will have a population of 190,000,000 people."

Now what are we going to do with all these people?

The question is one that must be answered. We know that if the arid region were reclaimed we could take care of this rapidly increasing population in the West as it overflowed from the congested centers of the East and in that way avoid the dangers which would result from the great overcrowding of the Eastern centers of population which will result unless this safety valve is provided.

A FLOOD TIDE OF IMMIGRATION.

We have not only to provide for the increase of our own population, which has already attained such vast proportions, we must provide also for a rapid influx of foreign immigrants. Their number is greater now than ever before. They are coming to our shores by the hundreds of thousands, notwithstanding all the restrictions we have placed on immigration. Now, if we continue to let these people crowd into our cities as they are doing now, they are a menace to our institutions and to our social peace. Anyone who will go through the foreign quarter of New York will be convinced that instead of improving they degenerate under the vile influence of the slums, and each year adds to the dangers from this class of our city population.

Another fact which should be borne in mind is that this horde of immigrants coming into our country, if they remain in places already thickly settled, are a detriment to our working people, because they compete for employment with them, and, being accustomed to a lower standard of living with fewer comforts, their competition must inevitably tend to reduce the wages and mode of life of our own laboring classes. There is no way to avoid this competition or to guard against the dangers of the congestion of these immigrants in our great Eastern cities except to get them out on the land in the Far West. If that can be done, they will build up prosperous communities, just as the immigration from Sweden and Norway has contributed so largely to the upbuilding of Minnesota and the Dakotas.

BENEFITS EVERY CLASS OF OUR PEOPLE.

When we look at the matter from a broad national point of view we see that every class of our people will be benefited by the creation of new communities in the arid region. Every new settler creates a demand for all the manufactured articles that he must use to cultivate his land, to stock his farm, to furnish his house, and to clothe himself and his children. When we look at the internal commerce and markets for our Eastern manufacturers which have been created by the 7,500,000 acres of land which have been reclaimed by private enterprise, we can form some idea, by comparison, of the enormous markets which would be furnished by the reclamation and settlement of the many millions of acres which can only be reclaimed by the action of the Government. In his message to Congress President Roosevelt said:

> In the arid region it is water, not land, which measures production. The western half of the United States would sustain a population greater than that of our whole country to-day if the waters that now run to waste were saved and used for irrigation. The forest and water problems are perhaps the most vital internal questions of the United States.

This new population could be built up just as fast as the irrigation works could be constructed, and no possible extension of our markets into foreign countries could be developed so rapidly or be so valuable to American manufacturers as the rapid development of markets through the increase of population and wealth in the arid region of the West as the result of the carrying out of the policy inaugurated by the bill now under consideration.

EMPLOYMENT FOR LABOR.

The benefits which would result to the laboring classes of our country are clearly apparent. The increased demand from the West for the products of Eastern factories would stimulate production in every branch of industry in the East. The mines, the furnaces, the rolling mills, the transportation companies, and every factory which transforms the raw material into the finished product would respond by increased activity and the rapidly enlarging demands for its products. This would all mean an increased demand for labor of every kind and throughout every locality in the East where either the raw materials are produced or where the factories are themselves located.

Not only this, but it is conceded by all thinking men that the comfort and contentment of our laboring classes depend upon keeping open opportunities for all who want them to get homes on the land. As Carlyle said:

> Ye may boast o' yer dimocracy, or any ither 'cracy, or any kind o' poleetical rubbish; but the reason why your laboring folks are so happy is that ye have a vast deal o' land for a verra few people.

The creation of the opportunity for millions of new home builders to get a parcel of the public domain would draw off the surplus of unemployed labor in the East in any period of hard times, and in this way act as a safety valve and preserve stable conditions beneficial to both labor and capital. It would relieve us of the greatest danger to our social stability which confronts us to-day—the danger arising from the possible throwing out of employment of a multitude of men in some period of business depression, such as we passed through a few years ago. In such times as that strikes and riots are inevitable, and we have had experience enough in the past to show their danger.

We have been told here to-day that it would injure the Eastern farmer if the arid region is reclaimed in the manner now proposed.

That idea is based upon a complete misconception of the proposed plan and ignorance of the conditions that exist in the West. Certainly no one would claim that it would benefit the farmers of the New England States or of New York or Pennsylvania if we should blot out or destroy every farm in the United States from the Allegheny Mountains to the Pacific Ocean. It is quite true that if that were done there would be a decrease of our agricultural productions, and in that sense less competition with these Eastern farmers. But no man could be found who would contend for the moment that the destruction of the farms of the Middle West would help the farmers of New York or Pennsylvania. The reason is plain. The best market the farmers of the Eastern States have to-day is in the great cities and centers of population which have been built up around our manufacturing industries. If those were wiped out the condition of the Eastern farmer would be sad indeed, and just as it would injure the Eastern farmer to destroy the farms that exist in the West to-day so it would benefit him to increase the agricultural development of the arid region. There are many reasons for this, in addition to the fact that it would stimulate Eastern manufacturing industries and the home market of the Eastern farmer.

The staple farm products can not profitably be produced on irrigated land except for local consumption. The cost of labor in farming by irrigation necessitates the intensive culture of small farms and a diversity of products to make the industry profitable. A great local market would be built up around every irrigated section by the development of mining, lumbering, and all the other varied industries of the West.

The reclamation of the arid region would necessarily be slow. The construction of the great irrigation works—reservoirs, dams, and canals—would necessitate the investment of large sums of money, the employment of labor, the utilization of the materials for construction, and the growth of many local industries, before a drop of water could be made available for the cultivation of the land. The development of the country would be symmetrical, all these industries growing up together, so that the local demand would be steadily created in advance of irrigation development.

The great staple product of the Middle West is corn. The reclamation of the arid land would make a market for the corn grower of the Middle West. Corn can not be raised in the arid region as a profitable commodity, but alfalfa can and will be raised. And the stock which is thus raised will be shipped as feeders to the corn States, and there the farmer who has raised the corn will feed it to them and put them in condition for the market.

In the extreme Northwest, in Wyoming, Montana, Idaho, and Washington, it may be possible, where water is very abundant and works can be cheaply constructed, to raise more wheat than will be required for local consumption, but the demand for American flour in Asia already far exceeds the available supply, and every pound of wheat raised in the arid region which is not consumed locally will be made into flour for shipment to the Orient.

> The flour exported from the Pacific coast goes to all quarters of the globe. Of the 3,000,000 barrels exported last year, however, more than 2,000,000 were shipped to China. It is upon the Chinese market that the Pacific coast miller will depend for his future. Up to ten years ago this market absorbed only about 500,000 bushels of wheat, but wherever flour has once got a foothold the Chinese never again return to their rice. Every day sees the flour market in China expand, and it will be but a short time until the consumption of flour in that country is limited only to the capacity of the Chinamen to buy or the American farmer and miller to produce.

Large areas of this reclaimed land, more especially in the Southwest, will be devoted to the raising of semitropical, citrus, and deciduous fruits, which will not in any way compete with the products of the Eastern farmer. Take southern California as an illustration. It sends East annually over $10,000,000 worth of fruit products. The railroad cars which haul this fruit East do not come back empty. They carry carload after carload of the products of our Eastern factories and goods of all kinds from the stores of our Eastern jobbers, which are used by the people of southern California. The money which the people of the East pay for the fruit is returned to them in this way, and finds its way into every channel of trade and commerce in the East, and a large share of it into the pockets of the Eastern farmer, who feeds the operatives in all the great factories of the East.

CONTROL OF THE MISSOURI RIVER FLOODS.

As everyone knows, we are spending year after year millions of dollars to control the floods of the Missouri and Mississippi rivers. If the waters which now run to waste in the winter and spring months and carry destruction in their pathway from Montana to the Gulf were stored back in great reservoirs and canals, the flow of the Missouri River could be so regulated that the winter flow would be lessened and the summer flow increased for navigation and the difficulty of keeping the channel of the Mississippi open for navigation would be materially lessened.

I desire to quote here from an article which appeared in the St. Louis Mirror of May 20, 1902, which was as follows:

IRRIGATION AND NAVIGATION.

> In view of the established scientific relations between their respective projects, it is singular that the advocates of irrigation and the extensive reclamation of arid lands and the friends of deep-water navigation from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico have not come together in some plan of mutual benefit. River navigators, engineers, and contractors who have struggled with the seemingly simple problem of establishing a uniform channel between St. Louis and New Orleans will tell you that the paucity of water in the late summer and dry autumn is not the salient feature of the problem which has interminably confronted and defeated them. Odd as it may seem, it is the wealth of water which rushes into the great waterways during the spring thaws and rains which effect the destruction of navigable channels established by hard work and long periods of accurate figuring.

In other words, the almost annual floods which rush into the Missouri, the Mississippi, the Arkansas, and other lesser tributaries of the projected waterway carry with them such a power of destruction, such a mass of silt, clay, sand, timber, and other erosions, that it is almost impossible to resist their advance or combat their deposits. A deep-water channel—deep, but comparatively narrow—could be easily maintained if the flood water did not wash into the rivers tons of earth and forests of trees, which, at the subsidence of high water, loom in the face of the most skillful engineers in the shape of sand bars, snags, and even unexpected courses. Setting aside the incredible destruction accomplished by the periodical floods which have devastated the lower valleys, is it not apparent that the annual defeat of the best engineering skill is sufficient to prove that the waste waters which thunder annually to tide water are the chief enemy to deep navigable channels from the Lakes to the Gulf? But when it is remembered that these destructive floods, marked by waste and desolation, have come thundering through a region which is absolutely starving for water, how imminent seems the suggestion that the reclamation of arid lands is not only supplementary but necessary to the local problem of deep-water inland navigation.

The fights which St. Louis lobbyists and friends of river improvement have fought and lost in the cause of inland appropriations would never have been lost if their demands had been reenforced by the common interests of the dwellers of Eastern or Western arid regions. Is it not apparent that the same general law which may compel the conversion and distribution of the aqueous yield of mountains and plateaus in the high arid regions would lessen the unmanageable, destructive, and wasteful flow of waters in the lower valley during the flood periods? "Give us a normal, constant flow of commensurate volume," say the best engineering experts of the world, "and we will fix a permanent channel from St. Paul on the Mississippi and from St. Joseph on the Missouri, and we will establish a navigable channel to the tide waters of the sea." What could better conspire to this end than a unity of interest between the advocates of irrigation, the friends of river and harbor appropriations, the exporters, and the shippers of all that vast and incomparable domain which stretches almost from the Allegheny Mountains to the crest of the Rockies? "Local interests" is what has always defeated all past efforts for river appropriations and for Federal provisions for irrigation. Here is the chance and now is the time for the advocates of both measures to get together. The reclamation of arid lands is eminently a question of national polity.

OUR BEEF SUPPLY.

We have read and heard a great deal within the last few months about the beef supply of the country. There is no doubt that our population is increasing more rapidly in proportion than our production of beef, and unless some relief is found for this situation it is only a question of time when instead of having beef for food our laboring classes will have to live on black bread, as they do in Europe, and meat will be a luxury with them. There is no occasion for allowing any such condition to arise. If the irrigable lands of the one State of Montana were reclaimed, that single State could produce more beef in one year than the whole arid region produces to-day. There is not a doubt in the world about that. It takes from 20 to 40 acres of average dry range to support 1 steer for a year, and 1 acre of irrigated alfalfa will carry a steer for four hundred days. If the irrigable arid public lands are reclaimed and divided up among small farmers who will irrigate their lands and raise alfalfa for stock, we can increase our beef supply as fast as our population increases for many years to come, and all danger of a beef famine will be passed.

There is no objection raised to this proposed plan being undertaken by the Government which is a sound objection.

We have been told that the Government, which is the owner of these lands, should not reclaim them itself, but should cede them to the States. It is a sufficient answer to that to say that many State grants have been already made of different amounts of land and for different purposes, and the experience of the past has demonstrated beyond any question that the States can not be safely intrusted with the reclamation and settlement of these lands. No matter what conditions might be imposed on such a grant, schemers and speculators would find some way of manipulating the State legislatures and getting control of the lands in large tracts which would retard settlement.

Another objection urged is that the reclaiming and settlement of the West will benefit the railroads. There is nothing that we can do to promote the welfare and prosperity of the whole people that will not benefit the railroads. The settlement of Illinois has undoubtedly benefited the railroads of Illinois, and the settlement of the West will benefit the railroads of the West; but it will benefit everybody else at the same time, and I think we have not yet reached such a stage of blind prejudice in this country that we are willing to forego benefiting the whole people because the railroad companies would participate in the benefit. Nothing is more widely disseminated than the money which is paid as the cost of transportation. It makes employment for the men who operate the roads, for the men who build the roads, for the factories that make everything for use in construction or operation—rails, rolling stock, terminal depot buildings, and everything else.

Again, we are told that we are beginning a raid on the Treasury. This objection is entitled to the least consideration of any of them. Under the plan of this bill the proceeds from the land are to be set aside as a fund for the construction of the irrigation works, and the investment in each irrigation system is to be repaid by the settlers who get the land, and every dollar invested comes eventually back to the Government. Not a dollar of tax is imposed on any Eastern farmer or Eastern citizen. It is only justice to those arid and semiarid States that the proceeds realized from their resources should be devoted to the reclamation of these vast uninhabitable wastes until communities can be created there which will be a basis for State taxation and provide for the expenses of the governments of these Commonwealths.

In some of the Western States more than three-fourths of the entire area of the State is Government land contributing no revenue to the State, and yet the State has to maintain law and order over the entire region. The only way to provide a permanent revenue for the State is to bring about the reclamation and settlement of the land. The only way that that can be done is for the National Government to do it, and this bill provides a conservative and sensible plan for accomplishing it

I believe that the proceeds from the sale of the public lands will be increased by the carrying out of the plan provided for in this measure. Wherever new areas are irrigated and communities built up, railroads will be built, mines will be opened, lumber will be needed, and mineral lands, timber lands, oil lands, and grazing lands will find purchasers, whereas otherwise there would be no demand for them.

The idea that the charges upon the land for the construction of the irrigation works will be finally remitted by the Government is another wrong conception. The settlers on these lands will be getting water from the Government works each year, and during the time they will be paying for their water rights they will much prefer that the Government should continue in charge of the system. And, more than this, the whole sentiment of the West will oppose any diminution of the fund, because the general development of that great country will be speeded by maintaining the fund intact and getting it back for reinvestment from each system of works that is built.

But even if it were so—which I deny—that the Government would not get back its investment from the land itself, it will get it back many times over in the form of revenues from the population created upon these arid lands. We have collected an annual revenue of as high as over $700,000,000 from 76,000,000 people—nearly $10 apiece for every man, woman, and child in the United States. If we were to carry to its full fruition the great project under consideration, the result would be a population in the Western half of the United States equal to the whole population of the country to-day, and the Government could collect in revenue from that population during each two years more money than it would ever be called upon to expend for the reclamation of the arid region.

Generally we say that statesmen are born about forty or fifty years before their time. We say to you that these gentlemen who are opposing this bill were born one hundred years too late. [Laughter.] If they had wanted to save this great expense to the Government, they should have been born one hundred years ago. They should have set up bars or guards all along the Allegheny Mountains. They should have prevented the people from coming West at all. They should have prevented the settlement of the Mississippi Valley. They should have prevented the Louisiana purchase. They should have prevented the passage of the homestead law. They should have prevented us from acquiring the lands which were ceded by Mexico. They should have prevented us from getting Washington and Oregon and Idaho. They should have prevented the annexation of Texas. Had they lived one hundred years ago they might have been regretting that Columbus had discovered America. If they are right now, it would be better for the country lying east of the Mississippi River if we could destroy everything between the Mississippi River and the Pacific Ocean. But, unfortunately for them, it is too late to do that. They should have been born one hundred years ago so that they could have prevented all that great Western region from being acquired or settled. In the interests of the Treasury they should have kept you from crossing the Allegheny Mountains. That is what they should have done. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Debate is closed on the pending amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. RAY of New York. I demand a division on that, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 35, noes 75.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania offer an amendment? If so, he will send it to the desk.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I call for the regular order.

Mr. STEELE. Did not he offer the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. He did not offer it.

Mr. STEELE. I offer it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 4, page 1, after the word "lands," insert "less the cost and expense of the administration and management thereof."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. DALZELL. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 35, noes 69.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend as follows: At the end of line 7, page 2, add the following:
"Provided, That from such receipts shall be first deducted the pro rata share of the expense of the public-land service, based upon receipts and expenditures."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to make examinations and surveys for, and to locate and construct, as herein provided, irrigation works for the storage, diversion, and development of waters, including artesian wells, and to report to Congress at the beginning of each regular session as to the results of such examinations and surveys, giving estimates of cost of all contemplated works, the quantity and location of the lands which can be irrigated therefrom, and all facts relative to the practicability of each irrigation project; also the cost of works in process of construction, as well as of those which have been completed.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

On page 2, section 2, lines 24 and 25, strike out the words, "including artesian wells."

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have this House understand what we undertake to do if we enact this bill into law. You are not content with taking the waters on the face of the earth for the purpose of irrigation, but, if you can not get waters from springs, lakes, rivers, and creeks and bring them to the arid lands, taking them away from other sections of the country and other States, you propose to go into the business of sinking artesian wells, expending money in large sums for that purpose. I understand that the gentlemen from Kansas are all in favor of this scheme. Why should they not be? The State of Colorado has appropriated and taken the waters of the great rivers that rise in Colorado and flow through Kansas. Kansas has arid lands and semiarid lands. She can not get the water from the natural streams to irrigate them, and she has sued Colorado. She may or may not succeed in her litigation. She comes here and wants us to furnish the water to supply the place of that which an irrigation scheme up in Colorado has taken away from them.

What do you propose by this bill? What is urged here by gentlemen in regard to supplying Kansas and other States with water? That we sink artesian wells. It is a conceded fact, it is alleged under oath by the officers of Kansas, that they do not have in their State and can not obtain water for irrigation purposes from rivers, springs, or small streams. The only way Kansas can get it is by sinking artesian wells. That is experimental work. We may sink an artesian well that will cost $500, $5,000, or $15,000. We may sink a well and get some water, but will we ever get enough in this way to irrigate the arid land in Kansas? I doubt it. I think this a waste of money. I claim and assert that it is not only a waste of money, but that it is a foolish scheme, and that it ought not to be retained in this bill.

Mr. TONGUE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes; if it is a short one.

Mr. TONGUE. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that Congress is annually providing by expenditure from the Treasury for doing this thing, and that this bill relieves the Treasury and puts the burden on the arid-land fund?

Mr. RAY of New York. I am aware that the Congress of the United States is not doing anything of the kind. I am aware that the Geological Department in the West is doing some experimental work.

Mr. TONGUE. Who appropriates the money?

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, the Congress of the United States is appropriating the money for this experimental work; but thus far it has proved a foolish expenditure of money and a useless undertaking. It is so conceded. Before the Arid Lands Committee I made the inquiry why it is the States having arid lands do not irrigate them themselves, why they did not carry on the work; and the answer was, by a gentleman who knows the facts, that they had tried it, and that it does not pay. Still the Representatives of these States come here, and you gentlemen seem to be inclined to authorize a scheme already demonstrated to be impracticable—that has failed in the States. The gentleman who wrote the majority report on this bill has admitted, and he can not deny it now, that the reason the States can not carry on this work successfully is that they do not have the money, that they have not the wealth with which to do the work, and therefore they appeal to Congress.

My good friend knows that the proceeds of these arid lands will never fully establish, construct, and put in operation these irrigation projects. My good friend knows that it will not be five years before these States will be here asking money to preserve these works. The following from the Journal of Commerce sheds some light on the subject and demonstrates the unwisdom of the scheme:

IRRIGATING AND LOOTING.

The purposes of the irrigationists have been exposed. There never was any doubt that their project was a scheme for using public money to increase the value of private property. The original irrigation bill did not show this and surprise was expressed at the moderation of that measure. But having won some degree of public confidence by their apparent conservatism, the representatives of the arid States have since amended the bill into the shape in which they wish it. One of the amendments is a clause inserted in the bill providing that "State and Territorial laws shall govern and control in the appropriation, use, and distribution of the waters rendered available by the works constructed under the provisions of this act."

To ascertain the full significance of this amendment it is necessary to go to the Report of the Secretary of Agriculture: "A few States have enacted enlightened codes of water laws, * * * but there are other States where investors in irrigation works and incoming settlers must depend on what they see, or on the statements of other settlers, in determining what is their prospect for securing the water supply needed in irrigation. Neither of these sources of information can be relied upon. * * * The chaotic and conflicting records of claims (in California), the uncertain limitations on riparian rights, and the failure to protect all rights by the public division of the water supply in times of drought has been a source of anxiety to the user and of expense and loss to the not less worthy owner of ditches and canals. The marvelous natural advantages of the State have been sufficient to offset these drawbacks, but the larger and better use of water in the future is dependent upon their removal. Especially is this true if the Government is to construct irrigation works. Under present conditions no one knows who would control the water made available by public funds. No one knows whether the needy user or the speculative holder of a water title would reap the benefits of this expenditure. The report on irrigation in Utah, soon to be published by this Department, shows with equal clearness the need of laws to insure stability and justice in the distribution of the water supply. These reports will be followed by similar investigations in other arid States."

The language of the President is: "With a few creditable exceptions the arid States have failed to provide for the certain and just division of streams in times of scarcity. Lax and uncertain laws have made it possible to establish rights to water in excess of actual uses or necessities, and many streams have already passed into private ownership, or a control equivalent to ownership. * * * Ultimately it will probably be necessary for the nation to cooperate with the several arid States in proportion as these States by their legislation and administration show themselves fit to receive it." The President contemplates the extension of national aid after the States have corrected their water laws; the representatives of the States propose to take the money at once and to affirm the whole mass of local legislation.

It is this chaotic mass of legislation and local custom which the irrigation bill, as the representatives of the arid States have amended it, will affirm and perpetuate. Secretary Wilson says that "no one knows who would control the water made available by public funds. No one knows whether the needy user or the speculative holder of a water title would reap the benefit of this expenditure." There is no doubt, however, that the advocates of the irrigation scheme know pretty well who would benefit by the affirmation of the local laws. It is not for public benefit that the irrigationists have put up the money for a periodical and two offices and a series of annual conventions. They have a pretty definite idea of what they are after.

Our Washington letter shows that the dimensions of the raid on the Treasury are five or ten million dollars a year for many years. The estimate of the Industrial Commission, which entered into this scheme with injudicious and unjudicial enthusiasm, put the total at $15 an acre for 20,000,000 acres, or $300,000,000; but while some irrigation costs less than $15 an acre a good deal costs over $20. The President tells us that $200,000,000 of private capital is already invested in irrigation works and several States have made extensive improvements in that line. The most expensive and least remunerative parts of the work will be left for the United States to do.

All the irrigation that is profitable will be done by private enterprise, and the lands benefited will pay the cost, as they should. The irrigation that will not pay should not be done at all. The Government has no business to raise the value of land held by private owners $20 or $50 an acre and get back indirectly and after a long time only a part of the cost of the improvement.

Mr. George H. Maxwell, representing the National Irrigation Association, has repudiated the bill in its present shape on the ground that "every open opponent of national irrigation will hail it as a confirmation of the charge that the whole movement is a scheme of speculators and land grabbers to loot the National Treasury for private profit."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate close on the pending paragraph and all amendments in ten minutes.

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, do not let us do business in that way. I have another amendment which I desire to offer at the end of the paragraph.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, make it fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado moves that all debate on this pending paragraph close in fifteen minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAY of New York) there were—ayes 60, noes 14.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No quorum, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-one members present, a quorum. The ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I would not occupy the time of the House at this stage of the bill were it not for the fact that the gentleman who just preceded me [Mr. RAY of New York] has said that I have admitted that we were asking the National Government to undertake this work because the States can not undertake it, or have failed in the attempt to do so. I do not know when I said anything of that kind. I do not recall that I ever said anything of the kind. If I did, it must have been in my dreams.

It the first place, Mr. Chairman, the States have never undertaken the work of irrigation to any considerable extent, and for a number of reasons, the first of which is that the States in the arid region own comparatively little land. The second place—and this is the reason I stated yesterday as the most potent one why the States can not undertake this work—is that the Government owns practically all the land in the arid States. In the State in which I live there is only 4 per cent of the land in the hands of private owners, including corporations. Ninety-six per cent of all the land pays no tax. Upon 4 per cent of our land we must support our institutions. And now the gentleman says that a State so situated ought to be able to irrigate the Government arid lands.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Did not the State of Wyoming receive all of the sixteenth and thirty-second sections——

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; they received them.

Mr. HEPBURN. And the sixteenth and thirty-second sections made more than 6 per cent of all the lands in the State, and with the other land grants made nearly 8 per cent of all the lands of Wyoming owned by the State.

Mr. MONDELL. Does not the gentleman also understand that the school lands—sections 16 and 36—may be mountain tops, may be nonirrigable; that as the irrigable valleys are narrow, only an infinitesimal percentage of the school lands in place can ever be irrigated? Further, the constitution of my State prohibits the State from undertaking any work of internal improvement.

But the Government is the owner of this great domain; the Government controls this great area, and we simply ask that the Government use the proceeds of the sales of the land there for the purpose of making the irrigable land fit for cultivation and habitation; and then we propose that the settlers on those lands shall do—what? Not what the settlers in the Mississippi Valley did, secure their lands ready for crops without money and without price, but that they shall pay to the Government every dollar of its expenditure in bringing water to their land, and, in addition to that, the great cost of building laterals, of leveling the land, and preparing it for irrigation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Did not the gentleman's State avail itself of the provisions of the Carey act granting a million acres to the State, and thereunder has not that State irrigated 60,000 acres?

Mr. MONDELL. The State did; and I will say to the gentleman, as a proof of what the Government may do under this bill, that my State has in a small way under the Carey act been quite successful and will continue the work under that act after this act is passed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] appealed to me as to whether or not it was probable that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands would develop the irrigation possibilities of the arid region. I believe they will. I believe that we shall receive sufficient funds from the sale of the public lands in that region to carry on all of the irrigation work that it is necessary the Government should undertake to carry on. I believe that the fund of two and a half to three million is sufficient for the present and that the fund will be augmented as the irrigated lands are sold, so that we shall have enough to carry on the work as rapidly as lands are required for settlement.

The people of the West accept this measure as the settlement of that question. We opposed the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania because it would not leave us a sufficient sum for the reclamation of our country; but if our lands are pledged to their own reclamation we believe that the arid West will reclaim itself, without the cost of a penny to any American citizen. We can not, of course, bind future Congresses, nor can we bind ourselves as to what we shall deem it our duty to advocate in the future. We now believe the fund we provide will be sufficient for the purposes intended, and certainly no direct appropriation will be granted from the Treasury unless Congress shall in its wisdom see fit to do so. If we do our duty here to-day and pass the bill, we can trust future Congresses will do theirs. [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, if I were not one of the most amiable and polite men in this House, I would take the liberty of saying that the proposition involved in this bill is the most insolent and impudent attempt at larceny that I have ever seen embodied in a legislative proposition. These gentlemen simply do what? They ask us, in the language of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT], to give away an empire in order that their private property may be made valuable.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question at this point?

Mr. HEPBURN. I would rather not.

Mr. MONDELL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question about his own State, as to whether or not the great State of Iowa was not given away?

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir.

Mr. MONDELL. I lived on a homestead there when I was a boy.

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir; the great State of Iowa was not given away. Even the lands that were granted to the railways the people of Iowa paid for by having to pay for the double minimum on the alternate acres, and the homestead act was not passed, the gentleman ought to know, until 1862, and Iowa had been taken up before that, and you could almost number the homesteads granted to people of Iowa on your fingers.

Mr. MONDELL. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that as a boy I lived on a homestead in Iowa, grew up on a homestead in Iowa, and I know of four Iowa counties that were settled in two years under the homestead act.

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, the gentleman is certainly mistaken. There was no such condition of public lands in the State of Iowa in 1862, when this act became a law. He is mistaken about it. Even the swamp lands that were given to Iowa we had to reclaim and did reclaim. The people did it. I undertake to say that of the 7,000,000 of acres——

Mr. REEDER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. I would rather not. The 7,000,000 of acres that have been taken up in the State of Wyoming are the lands that are now capable of irrigation; they are the lands that can be irrigated, and this proposition is that we shall give away the proceeds of 550,000,000 of acres of land in order that the present owners in the State of Wyoming and in other States shall have their lands reclaimed at public charge. That is the proposition, and you gentlemen know it, and that is what you are after. I remember that the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has said that there would not be more than a few millions of acres that would be capable of irrigation. Another gentleman has said that the land along the streams had been taken up. That is true. We know that. The lands along the streams are the lands that are level and that are susceptible of irrigation, and those are the lands that are to be the beneficiaries of this immense grant. Besides, Mr. Chairman, if that was not true I would be opposed to this bill. To-day from 20 to 25 per cent of the agricultural products of the United States are a surplus, so far as our own home consumption is concerned, and we are compelled to go abroad for a market.

Mr. REEDER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. I would rather not. I have told the gentleman so. I do not want to be impolite, but I want to use my five minutes. It seems that five-minute periods are getting pretty scarce in the timidity of you gentlemen. We have got this surplus. Every new farm increases that surplus. That surplus goes abroad, enabling the foreign purchaser to fix the price, and the foreign price fixes the price here at home, and I say with great deference that, in my judgment, any gentleman who comes from the great producing agricultural States is mistaken when he, by his vote here, assumes that his constituents are after more of this ruinous competition. When the time comes that these agricultural lands are needed, then is the time for their reclamation.

Let the people who are to be the beneficiaries then reclaim them, as we have had to do in the other States. That is wise. Again, here this proposition appropriates four and one-half millions of dollars. Why, gentlemen say that it is simply the proceeds of the lands, that they go into the Treasury, they become a part of the common fund. There is no difference, except for the speciousness of it, between a direct appropriation and the appropriation of the proceeds of the public lands. We might as well put our hands into the Treasury and take it out as to adopt this circuitous method.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that if this bill is a fraud, as charged by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], it is unfortunate that every officer of the Government of the United States whose duty it has been to study this question is a party to that fraud.

Capt. Hiram M. Chittenden, of the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, recently said that this work was as legitimate a duty of the Government as it is for it to dredge harbors and build light-houses. The Hydrographer of the United States has insisted for years that every great nation having arid land has been compelled to reclaim it through public funds, and that we should reclaim ours.

The Director of the Geological Survey has been one of the mainstays in pressing the passage of this bill, contending that it is a public duty and would be a great public benefit.

The Industrial Commission recently appointed by the President declared that this is a public duty and insisted that the Government should build one or more large reservoirs or diversion works at once along the exact lines of this bill; and it reported such a recommendation to Congress, which was signed by Hon. Albert Clarke, chairman, of Boston; Hon. BOIES PENROSE, Senator from Pennsylvania; Hon. THOMAS R. BARD, a Senator from California; Hon. J. J. GARDNER, a member of Congress from New Jersey; Hon. THEOBOLD OTJEN, a member of Congress from Milwaukee; Hon. William Lorimer, an ex-member of Congress from Chicago; Hon. John M. Farquhar, an ex-member of Congress from New York; Hon. Thomas W. Phillips, an ex-member of Congress from Pennsylvania; Hon. J. L. Kennedy, of the District of Columbia; Hon. Charles H. Litchman, from New Jersey, and Hon. D. A. Tompkins, of North Carolina, all lifelong Republicans.

The Secretary of Agriculture says if they will pass this bill and not disturb the sugar tariff that he will soon teach the agriculturists to grow the $100,000,000 worth of sugar that we now import from abroad.

The Secretary of the Interior asserts in his report that it is necessary that we begin the building of these reservoirs that our homeless population may secure homes.

The President of the United States says that it is an imperative duty that these reservoirs be built.

Now, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] talks as though the surplus of agricultural products was a detriment to our trade. The many good crops that we have had in the last three or four years have made our prosperity. Are you looking at the stock boards daily? What is the stock report from New York yesterday?

NEW YORK, June 12, 1902.

The stock market relapsed to-day into a torpid condition, and dealings fell off about one-third.

Now, why does it say they fell off one-third?

The reaction in the market was largely due to the better appreciation of the decrease in the coming wheat crop.

Was this slump in the stock market because it was feared that we would not have sufficient wheat for home consumption? No. The fears are that we will not have the usual millions of surplus bushels to keep our labor, our railroads, our farmers, our shipowners, our elevator companies busy, and will not be able to keep the great balance of trade in our favor.

Does not every man who thinks observe that nearly three-fourths of our great export trade is from the farm and from the range? Whenever the field is cut short hard times come, labor is idle, steam cars and ships stand still. Whenever crops are cut short, distress is felt everywhere. With all that may be said about the beef trust and its evil methods, the recent rise in beef was occasioned, in part at least, by the short corn crop of last year. Scarce corn made high corn. High corn made high beef. Whenever you cut down the crop you cut down prosperity, and raise prices to the consumer, and lessen the amount of work to be done, and lower wages and consumption. I live across the main range of the great Rocky Mountains in Colorado. We do not produce corn, but we consume it. We do not manufacture, but we buy many manufactured goods. We do not corn-feed beef cattle, but we grow many of them and ship them to the corn States to be fed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BELL. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, our friends talk about this injuring the Middle West. We have heard the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] before. He has declared upon this floor that he would never, while a member of this House, vote for the opening of a single acre of land while we had a surplus food product from our farmers. These great surplus products are what made Kansas, Nebraska, and Iowa the most prosperous agricultural States in this Union for three or four years last past. They not only shipped East, but to the phenomenal discoverers of gold in Cripple Creek, Leadville, and other parts of the West.

Train loads of corn have been going to the top of the Rocky Mountains and over onto the Pacific side ever since the mining camps have been thrifty, and the corn of Kansas, Iowa, and Nebraska in the last four or five years has been coming into that mountain country in train loads for the sheep feeders. The nights are too cold for us to grow corn. We in that region have been the best customers the farmers of those States have had, and we will quadruple this market if you will permit us to do so. My friends speak of the overproduction of agriculture. That is nonsense. America must supply the shortage of the earth. I settled in a little valley where we thought a few years ago that we were planting a surplus of hay, alfalfa, fruit, and raising a surplus of honey bees. We found we had as good a fruit region as any in California. We had as good bee and cow pastures as could be found anywhere. The timid sold out and left, because they thought we would have a dreadful surplus. The moment it was announced that we could furnish a train of cars loaded with honey, cattle, or fruit, buyers came from New York, Chicago, St. Louis, Omaha, and Minneapolis for our products. We sell them now much easier than when we had one-fifth of the products. So it is with our world's trade. The world buyers go where the largest surplus productions are to be found. England went to Missouri and the Mississippi Valley to buy her mules for the South African war because of the great stock this valley carries. The basis of our prosperity is our great agricultural productions, and the stability of our institutions depends upon the home owners. They are interested in the country because they own a part of it. They will lay down their lives in defense of their firesides. The homeless millions struggling for a mere existence can well stand off and say that "whoever takes possession we are no worse off; we have no interest in the country except in its miseries."

The home builders have ever been the most humane, the most inexpensive and successful governors. Every government of earth having any considerable amount of arid land has reclaimed it for the home builders. England is now putting tens of millions into damming and reservoiring the Nile and has expended hundreds of millions in India. England has made this pay. Australia is reclaiming her arid domain for the home builders. An agent of this Government cites our efforts to reclaim our arid lands by private capital as a dismal failure.

The home has ever been esteemed as the basis of the government. It is the great humanizer and civilizer of the world. We are spending hundreds of millions of dollars in trying to build up happy homes for alien peoples. Can anyone doubt the good-sense policy advocated by this bill in lending to the home maker a few millions to enable them to help themselves. Some members sneer at this home appeal for help for our own homeless and with a party spirit worthy of a better cause eagerly vote hundreds of millions to ameloriate the conditions of alien races in foreign lands. We may be lampooned by those fraught with sectional prejudice as mendicants and thieves for supporting this bill, but no Republican leader, however revengeful, will deny that we are in most respectable company, as we are gallantly led by a Republican President, by a Republican Secretary of the Treasury, by a Republican Secretary of Agriculture, by a Republican Director of the Geological Survey, by a Republican Hydrographer, by a Republican Superintendent of Forestry, by the engineers of the Government, and by every man whose duty it is to study these questions for the benefit of all the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RAY of New York. I ask unanimous consent for three minutes right here in connection with this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that he may address the committee for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to state that I do not propose to object to the gentleman from New York, but that I do propose hereafter to object to any further extensions of time; and I desire to make that announcement now.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAY of New York. In presenting the amendment now under consideration I stated that the gentleman from Wyoming in effect, has said that the main reason why the States did not undertake this irrigation and why they should not undertake it, is a lack of funds and ability. The gentleman says he does not know where or when he said that, if he has said it. I desire to refresh his recollection and the recollection of the House. I hold in my hand the report of the committee, drawn by the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL, from the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, submitted the following report.

And on page 3, he says:

It has been suggested that inasmuch as the States control the waters used in irrigation and have the highest possible interest in the development of the territory within their borders, they should undertake such works as are beyond the reach or scope of private enterprise. The answer to this is that it is utterly impossible for the States in the arid regions to undertake this class of work to any considerable extent, owing to lack of funds with which to carry them on, if for no other reason.

That is what I referred to. I may have inaccurately stated the language before, but not the idea.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask that I may have two minutes to continue the reading of my report at the point where the gentleman from New York left it off.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hate to object to the gentleman from Wyoming, but I gave notice that I would do so.

Mr. MONDELL. I withdraw my request. I will print the matter in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to section 2, which the Clerk will again report.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. RAY of New York. Let us have a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 16, noes 70.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior shall, at the time of giving the public notice provided for in section 4 of this act, withdraw from public entry the lands required for any irrigation works contemplated under the provisions of this act, and shall restore to public entry any of the lands so withdrawn when, in his judgment, such lands are not required for the purposes of this act; that public lands which it is proposed to irrigate by means of any contemplated works shall be subject to entry only under the provisions of the homestead laws in tracts of not less than 40 nor more than 160 acres, and shall be subject to the limitations, charges, terms, and conditions herein provided: Provided, That the commutation provisions of the homestead laws shall not apply to entries made under this act.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

In lines 7 and 8 strike out the words "at the time of" and insert in lieu thereof the word "before."

In line 13, after the word "act," insert the following: "And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, at or immediately prior to the time of beginning the surveys for any contemplated irrigation works, to withdraw from entry, except under the homestead laws, any public lands believed to be susceptible of irrigation from said works: Provided, That all lands entered and entries made under the homestead laws within areas so withdrawn during such withdrawal shall be subject to all the provisions, limitations, charges, terms, and conditions of this act; that said surveys shall be prosecuted diligently to completion, and upon the completion thereof, and of the necessary maps, plans, and estimates of cost, the Secretary of the Interior shall determine whether or not said project is practicable and advisable, and if determined to be impracticable or unadvisable he shall thereupon restore said lands to entry."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest that the committee amendments be first disposed of. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "at the time of" and insert the word "before."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers the following amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 14, page 3, beginning with the word "at," strike out all down to and including the word "to," in line 16, and insert in lieu thereof the words "and shall at the same time."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, lines 14, 15, and 16, strike out the words "at or immediately prior to the time of beginning the surveys for any contemplated irrigation works, to" and insert in lieu thereof the words "and shall at the same time."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order until debate has commenced.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I shall take but a moment to call attention to the amendment. The provision as it now is has a hiatus or a time between the publication or the public notice provided for in the first part of the paragraph and the time that the Secretary is directed to withdraw the lands from entry as provided in that portion to which I offer the amendment. During that interval of time the lands are liable and susceptible of entry and can be taken up by speculators. If this amendment which I have offered prevails, the Secretary is required to make both publications at the same time, and to withdraw the land from entry, except under the homestead laws, at the time when he makes the first publication, so the speculators will not have an opportunity to enter the lands contemplated for irrigation, and in that way it will be reserved for homestead entry. The opportunity for speculators to take advantage of the first publication and enter all the lands susceptible of irrigation under the provisions of this law will be destroyed by the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's amendment, instead of accomplishing the purpose which he says that he seeks to accomplish, I think would have quite the opposite effect. The bill provides that before the time of giving the public notice, etc., the public lands to be irrigated shall be withdrawn, so that under the provisions of the bill public lands can be withdrawn at any time. The moment the Secretary of the Interior has an idea of undertaking a survey for the irrigation of any tract, the lands to be irrigated can be withdrawn, and under the bill will be withdrawn. And, further than that, the Secretary of the Interior has the power, without this legislation, to withdraw public lands from entry at any time, and has recently withdrawn 2,000,000 acres from entry in Montana, pending the beginning of this survey.

A parliamentary question, Mr. Chairman. I understand the gentleman from Colorado moved that all debate on this section and amendments close in ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado did not make such a motion.

Mr. MONDELL. Then I make that motion now—that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments close in ten minutes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I move to amend that, and that all debate close in five minutes on this paragraph and all amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I hope the gentleman will make it ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that debate close on the pending paragraph and amendments in ten minutes, and the gentleman from Colorado moves to amend that by making it five minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move as a substitute that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto now close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves as a substitute that debate on the paragraph and the pending amendments now close.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAY of New York. As I understand the matter, one gentleman made a motion that all debate close in ten minutes, and to that an amendment was moved that all debate close in five minutes. Now, while that motion with that amendment is pending the gentleman from Alabama, with his usual courtesy, takes the floor and assumes that these other gentlemen are not entitled to be heard and makes an independent motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I made the motion, Mr. Chairman, as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the question. The gentleman from Wyoming moved that all debate on the paragraph and pending amendments thereto close in ten minutes, and to that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] moved an amendment that all debate close in five minutes, and then the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moved a substitute to close debate at once. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado to perfect the original motion by the gentleman from Wyoming that all debate close in five minutes on the paragraph and the amendments thereto.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. Is the motion debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not debatable.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the substitute for the original motion, proposed by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the substitute motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the original motion as amended by the substitute.

The question was taken, and the motion as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] to the committee amendment.

The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. JOY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr.

PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 12865. An act regulating the use of telephone wires in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 9334. An act to amend an act to prohibit the passage of special or local laws in the Territories, to limit the Territorial indebtedness, etc.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6110. An act granting an increase of pension to Charles A. Cooke; and

S. 4067. An act granting an increase of pension to Julia L. Gordon.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to furnish to the House of Representatives a duplicate engrossed copy of the joint resolution (S. R. 100) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for an equestrian statue of the late Maj. Gen. William J. Sewell, United States Volunteers, in compliance with its request.

RECLAMATION OF ARID LANDS.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That upon the determination by the Secretary of the Interior that any irrigation project is practicable, he shall give public notice of the lands irrigable under such project, and limit of area per entry, which limit shall represent the acreage which, in the opinion of the Secretary, may be reasonably required for the support of a family upon the lands in question; also of the charges which shall be made per acre upon the said entries, and upon lands in private ownership which may be irrigated by the waters of the said irrigation project, and the number of annual installments, not exceeding 10, in which such charges shall be paid and the time when such payments shall commence, the said charges to be determined with a view of returning to the reclamation fund the estimated cost of construction of the project, and shall be apportioned according to benefits. After giving the public notice aforesaid the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be let contracts for the construction of the necessary works, in whole or in part, providing the funds therefor are available in the reclamation fund. In all construction work eight hours shall constitute a day's work, and no Asiatic labor shall be employed thereon.

The Clerk also read the following committee amendments:

Strike out all of section 4 and insert the following as section 4:

"SEC. 4. That upon the determination by the Secretary of the Interior that any irrigation project is practicable, he may cause to be let contracts for the construction of the same, in whole or in part, providing the necessary funds therefor are available in the reclamation fund, and thereupon he shall give public notice of the lands irrigable under such project, and limit of area per entry, which limit shall represent the acreage which, in the opinion of the Secretary, may be reasonably required for the support of a family upon the lands in question; also of the charges which shall be made per acre upon the said entries, and upon lands in private ownership which may be irrigated by the waters of the said irrigation project, and the number of annual installments, not exceeding ten, in which such charges shall be paid and the time when such payments shall commence. The said charges shall be determined with a view of returning to the reclamation fund the estimated cost of construction of the project, and shall be apportioned equitably: Provided, That in all construction work eight hours shall constitute a day's work, and no Mongolian labor shall be employed thereon."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the status of the section. The committee reports a substitute for the section. Amendments to the original section of the bill will of course be first in order, and then amendments to the substitute.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I could not hear the statement of the Chair as to what would be first in order.

The CHAIRMAN. A substitute for the original section is reported by the committee. The Chair states that amendments to the original section, if there are any, will be first in order, and after that amendments to the substitute.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on the paragraph and amendments close in ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] that the motion to close debate in the committee can not be made until the debate has commenced.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Debate has commenced.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair and the gentleman disagree. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SNOOK] is recognized.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SNOOK] to the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 8 and 9, on page 5, strike out "in whole or in part," and in line 9 strike out the word "therefor," and insert in line 9, page 5, after "fund," the words "for the entire completion thereof."

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the part of section 4 which I seek to amend now reads as follows: That upon the determination of the Secretary of the Interior that any irrigation project is practicable, he may cause to be let contracts for the construction of the same, in whole or in part, providing the necessary funds therefor are available in the reclamation fund, and thereupon he shall give public notice of the lands irrigated under such project. If amended will read as follows: "That upon the determination of the Secretary of the Interior that any irrigation project is practicable, he may cause to be let contracts for the construction of same, providing the necessary funds for the entire completion thereof are available in the reclamation fund, and thereupon he shall give public notice of the lands irrigated under such project."

It has been claimed by the friends of this bill in every part of the debate so far as I have heard that they do not intend, or at least they have intimated that they do not intend, to fasten upon the Government as a permanent policy the making of appropriations from year to year for the purpose of reclaiming these lands.

It was urged against this bill by the able gentleman who made the minority report that this section, as reported by the committee, would permit the commencement of these works, and that after they were commenced these people would come to Congress and say, "You have now invested a large sum of money in commencing these works; we do not want to see that money lost by the decay or falling down of the work; and we would like to have Congress make a permanent appropriation."

I have offered this amendment so that the Secretary of the Interior can not commence the work of reclamation or of building these reservoirs or dams until there is in this fund named in the bill sufficient money to wholly complete each project upon which he is about to enter.

It seems to me that if the gentlemen who favor this bill are in earnest in their declarations or intimations they should be in favor of putting into the measure this amendment to provide that the Secretary of the Interior can not enter upon this work until he has in hand the money on which to draw to fully complete the work.

To my mind the most dangerous part of this measure is that, as I believe, it commits this Government to the permanent policy of making an appropriation of from five to ten million dollars a year in the future for the reclamation of arid lands.

I heard the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] challenge the gentlemen who were urging this measure to rise in their places and say to this Congress that they did not intend to come to future Congresses and ask for these direct appropriations. But the silence which has followed that challenge has been death like. No man who is in favor of this bill has yet said in this debate that he does not intend to ask in the future that this country shall be bound to a general policy of permanent appropriations to carry on this work, although without committing themselves they would like us to so understand until the vote is taken on the adoption of the bill. I think, Mr. Chairman, that is the worst feature of the bill, and for that reason this amendment of mine ought to be adopted.

But there are many other reasons why I oppose the adoption of this measure as a whole. The district which I have the honor to represent in this body is made up largely of low, level lands. They were originally covered with vast forests. When the farmer came to that country in search of a home he was confronted at the outset with the almost insurmountable task of felling and clearing away these forests.

This was accomplished only by the most incessant and severe toil. When he had cleared away the forest he found that his land was so level that at many seasons of the year it was wholly covered with water, so that it was impossible to raise a crop. At first he had no money with which he could pay for the drainage of his lands. He was compelled to rely on his own resources. So he hitched his horses to the plow and scraper and constructed the outlet ditches necessary to commence the work of drainage. Soon he was enabled to raise small crops, and he began at once to burden himself with taxation in order to raise further means to carry on the work. He then found that if he would be at all successful he would be compelled to arrange a complete system of drainage by placing tile drains in the land at intervals of eight rods apart.

He has accomplished all this by his own efforts. And every acre so improved has cost him in labor and money from twenty to forty dollars. As a result of this sacrifice he has had the satisfaction of knowing that he has developed and built up one of the richest and most productive agricultural districts in the world. I believe that the difficulties with which he was confronted were fully as great as those which confront the home seeker in the arid regions. He overcame all these difficulties unaided and alone. He never received, yea, more than that, he never asked, for a cent of Government aid.

And now you propose to tax him and the fruits of his unaided toil to build up a great farming section where products will be raised to compete with those that he raises on the farm that he has made tillable without any assistance on the part of the Government whatever.

I do not oppose the irrigation of the arid lands, and believe that they should be brought under cultivation as all other lands have been. I can not, however, believe that this is a just measure, and while I do not have time to make an extended argument against the bill, I desire to briefly sum up the reasons why, in my judgment, the measure should not be adopted, even though my amendment should be agreed to.

First. It is not what it or its friends pretend it is. During the course of this debate the claim has many times been made that it carries no direct appropriation, but seeks only to use the proceeds of the sale of the public lands. However, the terms of its first provision will eventually take from the States of this Union the money that has annually heretofore gone to support their agricultural colleges, amounting each year to the sum of $1,200,000, also the annual appropriation for the maintenance of agricultural experiment stations, amounting to $720,000. This sum of $1,920,000 has heretofore been provided for from the proceeds of the sale of public lands, and the provisions of this section will leave these institutions for their support to a direct appropriation from the public Treasury. Thus it will be seen that the measure owes its existence to this provision providing for a direct appropriation from the public funds.

Second. Its advocates are not sincere when they argue that it does not create a public charge, for the reason that they refuse to permit an amendment confining the entire expense of inaugurating and operating the scheme to the fund arising from the sale of the public lands named in the bill.

Third. Its principles are in direct conflict with the teachings of my party, that the people of the States shall be left, as far as possible, to develop their own industries.

Fourth. Several of its provisions are in conflict with the Constitution.

Fifth. Guarded by few and indefinite regulations, it lodges in the Secretary of the Interior a most dangerous discretion.

Sixth. It undoubtedly commits the Government to the policy of making a direct appropriation from the public Treasury at the expense of the people of the whole country for the benefit of a single section.

Seventh. It will create a horde of new Government officers and employees, who like all that have gone before will never be called on to abdicate their office or employment.

Eighth. In the selection of sites for the various improvements it gives the Secretary of the Interior a power to exercise favoritism that will prove to be most troublesome and dangerous.

Ninth. It launches the nation in a great business enterprise, far from the seat of government, in the carrying out of which our experience has shown us there will be great waste and corruption.

In conclusion, I desire to say there is but one safe course for the nation to pursue, and that is to favor no State, no people, and no section, but render equal justice to all. [Loud applause.]

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee rose informally; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, several messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the Chair will lay these messages before the House now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the Committee of the Whole will resume its sitting.

IRRIGATION OF ARID LANDS.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session (Mr. TAWNEY in the chair).

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this section and all amendments close in ten minutes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I move to amend that motion by substituting fifteen minutes for ten minutes.

Mr. RAY of New York. Let me say a word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the question. The gentleman from Colorado moves to amend the motion of the gentleman from Montana by making the time in which debate shall be closed fifteen minutes.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on the Irrigation of Arid Lands I made the report of the minority against this bill. I have several amendments which I desire to offer. I have two amendments to this section, then another amendment which is to strike out section 7. I have asked the gentlemen not to limit debate at this time. In defiance of that request they seek to cut off all debate.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman want unlimited debate?

Mr. RAY of New York. If you will allow the time to run on until I have had an opportunity to offer those two amendments and to speak on each of them for five minutes, I shall not have another word to say until we come to section 7, which I wish to strike out; and if I fail in that, I shall have but little further to say in opposition to the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. You can have five minutes on those amendments when we come to section 7.

Mr. RAY of New York. But these two other amendments——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado, to amend the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming so as to provide that the debate on the pending section and amendments be closed in fifteen minutes.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 73, noes 6.

So the amendment of Mr. SHAFROTH was agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. MONDELL as amended was then adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending section and amendments will close in fifteen minutes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD and Mr. RAY of New York rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be recognized next, because I have an amendment that I would like to submit.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 9, strike out the word "therefor" and insert the following: "to fully complete and put into operation such irrigation project;" so it will read: "That upon the determination by the Secretary of the Interior that any irrigation project is practicable, he may cause to be let contracts for the construction of the same, in whole or in part, providing the necessary funds to fully complete and put in operation such irrigation project are available in the reclamation fund."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that his amendment will have to wait until the pending amendment is disposed of. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

On the request of Mr. HOLLIDAY, without objection, the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I understand from the gentleman in charge of the bill, my colleague on the committee, that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] has an amendment on the same subject, which I understand him the committee will accept. I would like to have it reported, in order that I may know whether it covers the point.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment for the information of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 9, page 5, at the beginning of said line, the words "whole or in part" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in such portions or sections as it may be practicable to construct and complete as parts of the whole project;" and strike out, in line 9, the word "therefor" and insert in lieu thereof the words "for such portions or sections."

Mr. HOPKINS. There is no objection to that, is there?

Mr. MONDELL. There is no objection.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I understand the committee will accept the amendment which I will offer, and perhaps that will facilitate matters.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offered an amendment; and if he withdraws that and the amendment of the gentleman from Maine is offered in lieu thereof, it will then be before the committee for consideration.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, it may be a little informal, but before I yield the floor or withdraw my amendment I would like to hear from the gentleman from Maine as to the effect of his amendment. I will withdraw mine if satisfied that his accomplishes the purpose I desire to accomplish by the amendment which I sent to the desk.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of my amendment is simply this: It provides for the construction of irrigation works in portions or in sections, and requires that there shall be on hand reclamation funds enough to take care of each successive portion or section of the whole project, to obviate this proposition, which is a very serious one, that they might embark upon an expensive part and spend only a part upon that before they embark upon another and then come to Congress asking an appropriation for the balance in order to preserve the money already invested. This requires them to construct it piecemeal, by sections or portions, and they can not proceed with the contract until they have got money on hand to do it with. Do I make myself plain?

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the House that that does not cover a most serious objection to this bill from one standpoint. That is from the standpoint of those who believe it to be constitutional; and I desire to state why. The bill as it now reads authorizes the Secretary to commence this work and let contracts for the construction of the same in whole or in part, providing the necessary funds therefor are available in the reclamation fund, the word therefore referring to a part. So he can let a contract for the construction of the mere foundation of a reservoir, then spend all the money in the fund, and then come to Congress and appeal for money from the general Treasury to complete that project, on the plea that it is necessary in order to preserve the work already begun.

The amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] does not correct that evil. The amendment I send to the desk does correct it, because it provides in terms that there must be money enough in the reclamation fund to complete each project before the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to let a contract for the construction of the works made necessary by the adoption or the approval of that particular scheme. Therefore I insist on a vote upon my proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Now I offer my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine offers an amendment, which has been reported.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Which is agreeable to the committee and the authors of the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. We have no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I think there is a little more time for debate on this.

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes more time. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is recognized.

New York

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, the bill has been stripped of all its subterfuges. The pretense was that no money was to come out of the Treasury for the purpose of irrigating these arid lands. It was all to be paid from the proceeds of the sale of the lands in these States and from the money that was collected of the people who entered upon the lands as settlers. That was the scheme which seemed to catch a good many members of the House. They thought it was a scheme to bring in a good many million acres of land without any expense to the country. Of course they did not stop to think that the three million or more dollars of money that comes into the National Treasury every year from this source for general purposes was to be taken and used in the first instance for the payment of these irrigation works. It will diminish the revenue by that much and increase the taxes upon the rest of the people of the United States by the amount of money that formerly came into this fund and was useful for general purposes.

Then, as we progressed, a motion was made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] to amend the bill so as to reserve the college land grants, or the grants from the sale of lands for the benefit of the colleges. I notice that every gentleman who advocates this bill voted against that amendment, which was simply notice to the people of the House and the people of the country that the claim that this irrigation was to cost nothing was a mere subterfuge. It was not fair to the House or fair to the people of the country.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Moreover, if the gentleman will allow me, it was a direct and deliberate slaughter of the future of the agricultural colleges, and everybody understands it.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no; these gentlemen intend to vote that money out of the Treasury for the colleges. No member of this House in favor of this bill can justify himself in the idea that this is not like a direct appropriation from the Treasury of the United States and a direct tax upon the people of the United States.

Then a motion was made to amend the bill so that the expenses of administration should come out of this fund, and these gentlemen said no. One of them said, in answer to my inquiry, that it was provided in another section of the bill, and while he was looking it up and trying to find it, another one said no, it was not provided in another part of the bill; but the difficulties were so great in separating these expenses that it could not possibly go in as an amendment, and therefore they must vote it down.

Now, what does that mean? If this bill shall pass—and, by the way, these were the answers made to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], when he asked if it did not entail upon the people of this country an expense of $750,000,000? The answer was, by the vote of every man who favored this bill, to saddle this expense of the agricultural colleges, and to saddle the expense of administration, by taxation, upon the people of this country. And this is the only response I have heard to that inquiry. The most zealous and the most enthusiastic champions of this bill will admit that it will cost at least $750,000,000. Another said $800,000,000. These are the guesses now. What will the reality be? Who can say? Is my good friend who sits in front of me, the chairman of the committee [Mr. MONDELL], able to say what it will cost the people of the United States? Why, I met a gentleman who represents a New Jersey farming district, who said he went out home the other day and drove along the road, and the farmers stopped their plows and their teams in the middle of the furrow and came out to him and said, "Do not vote for that irrigation bill, because it means to put a tax upon us to furnish lands for somebody else."

Now, gentlemen, if you intend that this money shall come out of the Treasury and the taxpayers of the United States, why not say so? You have got votes enough to pass your bill, evidently. Why not be honest with the people of the United States and say so, and let us understand what the proposition is? You know it will come out of the Treasury of the United States. Every dollar of this fund that is diverted comes out of the Treasury of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to have two minutes more, and then I will not bother the committee any more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate closes in five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed two minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. PAYNE. Do I understand the gentleman from Alabama to object?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I notified the committee some time ago that I would object to further extensions of time.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. Chairman, before entering upon an argument as to the merits of national aid to irrigation I feel it my duty to answer, in some measure at least, the objections made on yesterday by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY]. His principal objection seemed to run to the constitutionality of the bill under consideration. Without attempting to cite any constitutional authorities, as I think it wholly unnecessary, the gentleman having already committed himself in that he admitted that it was within the prerogative of Congress to improve rivers and harbors, especially if the improvements were to be made to the harbor of New York. Why should the Government make such improvements? I answer, because by so doing it is providing facilities for transportation of the various products of the United States, thus creating wealth. Apart from transportation there is no wealth, and I can not conceive that any article of manufacture or product of forest or farm or of the mine, outside of the local use of such articles or products, can possess the least value, and no value can be created for such articles or products until means of transportation are created, so as to convey these articles to some other point for exchange. Now, if transportation gives value and creates wealth for the nation, it is right for the Government to create and improve everything that will facilitate the creation of wealth. If the irrigation of 55,000,000 acres of land will increase its value to the extent suggested by the gentleman—that is to say, from ten to twenty times its original value—then is it not true that irrigation of the arid lands will increase the national wealth, and is it not therefore right and most eminently proper under the Constitution for the Government to inaugurate a system by which the wealth of the nation will be so greatly augmented?

Another objection was that railroad companies owning large areas of arid lands would be great beneficiaries. For reply to this I have only to say, if the statement of the gentleman from New York be true, and I believe it is a fact, is it not true that each private owner, whether it be an individual, a copartnership, association, or corporation, will be subject to the same rules and regulations as the individual settler or homesteader, and will have to pay the same price for the water per acre-foot? If railroad companies shall be benefited thereby, is it or not true that is because of the increased value or wealth? And if this be true, then it is a proper enterprise for the Government to undertake, and certainly comes within the constitutional powers of Congress, as much so, at least, as to improve rivers and harbors out of the National Treasury, the propriety of which and absolute necessity for which are admitted by all thinking men.

Mr. Chairman, in presenting this question a mere statement should be and would be sufficient to commend irrigation to each and every member of this body, if each and all were familiar with the territory and its possibilities, known as the arid regions lying west of the one hundredth meridian, and comprising all that area included in the States of California, Colorado, Idaho, Kansas, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, North Dakota, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming, and the Territories of Arizona, Oklahoma, and New Mexico.

In order to more fully comprehend the situation, we must first remember that the United States Government is the owner of about 600,000,000 acres of land, of which about 55,000,000 are supposed to be susceptible of reclamation, the greater portion of which is absolutely worthless in its present arid condition, and to improve this condition and give such lands value, irrigation must be resorted to, and the United States Government only can make this improvement. If an individual owned these lands and had the financial ability to convert this worthless waste into good farms, from which he could derive immense revenue, and should fail to do so, the world would pronounce him an improvident fool; and were he a trustee, equity would hold him responsible for his gross mismanagement and conduct in care of the estate. Now, it is not true that the Government holds these lands as trustee in trust for all the people, and if good business methods should obtain with the individual, why should not the people demand of this Government the exercise of the same correct business principles?

The Government owns the watersheds and the lands; the flowing streams, to the extent of their flowage capacity, have been appropriated by the people and no further reclamation can obtain until some method of conserving the waters of those streams, which, under present conditions, run to waste during winter and springtime, is inaugurated. Now, with water in abundance convenient to the lands upon which it could be used, is it not and would it not be in perfect accord with good business methods to reclaim these lands, place settlers thereon, and thus give value to the lands and homes to the settlers who anxiously await the advent of the national irrigation morn?

Mr. Chairman, the cost of constructing reservoirs, should the Government undertake it, is, so to speak, making one hand wash the other; that is to say, the lands in the arid belt must be the source from which all revenues for the purpose of making the improvements, such as dams, reservoirs, and canals, must be derived.

The bill under consideration provides that the moneys arising from the sale of public lands within the arid region may be used for this purpose. It therefore follows that the arid lands must reclaim themselves without depending on any other source for revenue for said purpose. Then, if irrigation of these public lands without cost to the Government will render millions of acres of land susceptible of being converted into beautiful homes, increasing the wealth of State and Government, why should any objection to the bill under consideration obtain. This bill was formulated by the members of both Houses representing the arid States and Territories, critically examined and passed upon by the committee of the Senate and agreed to by that body, carefully examined and favorably reported by the committee of this House, recommended by the President of the United States, and advocated by both the Democratic and Republican parties in national conventions assembled in the year 1900, the Republican party adopting as a part of its platform the following sections or paragraphs, to wit:

> In pursuance of the constant policy of the Republican party to provide free homes in the public domain, we recommend adequate national legislation to reclaim the arid lands of the United States, reserving control of the distribution of waters for the irrigation of the respective States and Territories.

The language of the Democratic platform on this subject is as follows, to wit:

> We favor an intelligent system of improving the arid lands of the West, storing the waters for purposes of irrigation, and the holding of such lands for actual settlers.

These are the two planks respectively contained in the platforms of said parties, and promulgated to the people of the United States, and held out as the articles of faith of the respective parties, advocated by campaign speakers of both parties, and adopted by the people of the United States at the polls in November, 1900. Now, each and every member of this House, elected as a Democrat or Republican or as indorsers of said platforms, or either of them, from a moral standpoint is bound to carry out the will of the electors by whose votes each and every one of us has the honor of being a member of the greatest legislative body on earth, of the greatest country on earth; and a failure to stand by and carry out a principle so clearly expressed in each of the said platforms should meet with a fitting rebuke at the polls at the next election.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen may ask, Is irrigation by the Government necessary? I answer yes, for the following reasons:

The overcrowded condition of the population in the East in nearly every department, especially that of farming, demands that a safety valve whereby this condition may be relieved should be created. Farmers, young and old, all over the Eastern, Central, and Southern States are looking to the arid regions for homes, the supply in the vicinity of each having been long since exhausted. The West is the only region to which each of those longing to lead a rural life upon his own freehold can look with any degree of hope. Will you blast this hope or will you grapple with the situation, and by your votes say to these ambitious home lovers and home builders, behold, we have stayed the flood waters of the mountain streams that the desert may become covered with verdure, that you and your posterity may own and till, holding the same as an eternal heritage?

It is also necessary to provide some means of relieving the North Atlantic States from the great influx of foreign immigrants. The number of immigrants who have arrived in the United States within the four months ended April 30, 1902, is nearly double that of either of the two preceding years; that is to say, the number of immigrants who arrived in the United States during the first four months of 1900 is 149,994; for the same period in 1901, 154,042, and for the same months in 1902, 233,087. This last rate continued throughout the year would make a total increase for the year of 699,261. This immense increase annually will sorely tax the assimilative powers of the United States to their very utmost extent, for these people must find employment in the East or South, or go West and enter the agricultural arena and begin the fight for existence, or, failing in these, turn tramp and become a menace to the lives and property of the people.

It is also necessary to foster irrigation for the reason that making of an increased and increasing number of homes in the arid region will create a necessary additional market for a large portion of all products of the Eastern, Central, and Southern factories; a million settlers or homesteaders means a million consumers, besides their families. The South furnishing the cotton and products of the mill, the great empire of New York will find a growing market for her textiles, furnishing goods, gloves and mittens, leather and leather goods, publications, paper, musical instruments, refined sugars, carpets and rugs, hosiery and knit goods, hats, worsted goods, and various other articles; Massachusetts would experience an increased and increasing demand for the products of her cotton mills and shoe factories; Pennsylvania will have to increase the capacity and output of her iron and glass works; Virginia will find it necessary to increase her acreage of tobacco and the capacity of her factories; Kentucky will experience a new and growing demand for her tobacco, hard woods, and the products of her wagon and plow factories; Ohio, Illinois, and Michigan will have to rise earlier and work later to meet the demands of this new empire for the products of these States, respectively; so each and every State east of the one hundredth meridian will be a beneficiary of this national enterprise.

It is also necessary for the United States Government to inaugurate this system, because it is a well-known fact that the range of the arid regions is so diminishing annually as to endanger the stock business of that section, upon which a large portion of the Eastern people are dependent as a source of meat supply, it being only a question of time when the stock raisers can no longer depend upon the range, and they will have to resort to the irrigated lands to sustain their stock or retire from business. The latter course, if adopted by them, would result in such a diminution of the meat supply as to place the American laborer on a par with his foreign competitor, who boasts of his occasional financial ability to supply his family with meat one meal per week and more frequently one meal per month.

It is also necessary to increase the acreage of the arid lands, for in this way only can we prevent the meat supply from being so greatly diminished as to make the stock industry susceptible to the machinations of the trusts, which without compunction rob the consumer and gloat over their success in victimizing all classes of people regardless of their financial condition. The golden hoof has been eulogized by celebrated writers for centuries in poetry and song, and while this character may obtain in some sections of the country, the golden hoof in the West or arid sections is a destroyer of nature's covering for the lands which, denuded of their verdure year by year, augment the desert waste, which, thus unprotected, becomes heated and dry and is an increasing menace to the States east of and adjacent to the arid belt. In these arid wastes the simoon is born, which, rising, is carried by the winds into more favored regions and becomes a blighting sirocco, withering and destroying all vegetation in its pathway.

It is also necessary to encourage the mining industry by the inauguration of national irrigation. Mines containing only low-grade ore, which can not now be profitably worked because of their remoteness from food supply, would, under a development of the now arid lands, add greatly to the output of the mines, the annual product of which, according to the latest authentic reports, amounts to $1,000,000,000. This would give employment to thousands of now idle men, and would become a benefit to every other industry in the United States, in that these miners would consume and necessarily have to purchase the products of every other industry.

Mr. Chairman, I have been informed, whether credibly so or not, that Eastern and Southern farmers oppose this measure on the ground that they can not successfully compete with the Western farmer. In this they are mistaken, for the Western farmers are so handicapped by the long haul from West to East that they can not afford to ship anything to the East except cattle, sheep, and the metals from the mines, and so far as sheep and cattle are concerned, the demands for meat and the immense supply heretofore furnished by the Western ranges being gradually and surely diminished each succeeding year, admonish us that the destruction of the range means a great diminution in the supply of meat from that source, and that if the people of the East desire to eat meat, irrigation must furnish the Eastern deficit in the very near future.

Irrigation, instead of being an injury to the Eastern and Southern farmer, will prove of incalculable benefit to them, in that we are informed by the most recent census statistics that the agriculturists of the country furnish the manufacturers with products equal in value to nine-tenths of the cost of all factory products. Conceding this to be true, any increase in consumers would of necessity create additional demands for manufactured products, which in turn would require an additional number of men to increase the output commensurate with such demands, and the Eastern and Southern farmers would have to supply products equal to nine-tenths of the cost of the additional factory products. Thus it is seen that the farmer and manufacturer are mutually dependent on each other, and that any improvement in the one works an advantage to the other. In other words, the farmer is largely dependent on the factory for the market for the products of the farm, whereas the manufacturer is dependent on the farmer to the extent of all necessary farm products with which to conduct his business and largely dependent on the farm for a market for the products of the factory. In this the Eastern, Central, and Southern farmers will have the advantage of being the greatest beneficiaries, in that they will furnish an amount equal to the cost of nine-tenths of all factory products, a demand for which will be created by the reclamation of the arid region, it being a well-established fact that when the farmer is prosperous it means prosperity for all other industries.

Mr. Chairman, the assertion may be made that irrigation by national aid is an experiment that may prove detrimental to the interests of this Government. For reply to this I am happy to say that reclamation of arid lands has long since passed the experimental stage and exists now, and has existed for nearly four thousand years, as a fixed fact, and that it will prove beneficial requires only the formulation of the plans and construction of reservoirs and canals. The farmer with his laterals will furnish the proof which will demonstrate the great benefit arising from this enterprise. Two thousand and eighty-four years before the singing of the morning stars lulled to repose our infant Redeemer irrigation was being successfully conducted in and on the lands adjacent to the Nile. Lake Mares, a reservoir 50 miles in circumference, was constructed, some historians affirm, by King Marias. Others affirm that it was constructed by Amenunhet the Third two thousand and eighty-four years before the birth of the meek and lowly Nazarene. This gigantic reservoir served a twofold purpose—that is to say, when the Nile was at flood and danger of overflow seemed imminent to the lands below the aqueduct, the surplus waters were run into the reservoir and thus prevented overflow. The waters thus conserved were thus held until the Nile became low and drought threatened the farms. Then the waters were released, the lanes were watered, the soil, responding yielded, up the various products of garden and field in great abundance.

Sesostris, who reigned in Egypt in the year 1491 B. C., is said to have had a great number of canals constructed for trade and irrigation, which canals were so numerous that it is estimated that they would convey nine-tenths of the water of the Nile for domestic use and irrigation, leaving but one-tenth of the stream flowing into the Mediterranean Sea. When General Agathocles, a Syracusan, with his army invaded Egypt, he wrote that the African shore was covered with gardens and large plantations and numerous canals by which the lands were watered. Fifty years later Polypus drew a similar picture of this successful farming and gardening by means of systematic irrigation. To protect the great city of Babylon from the overflowing of the Euphrates, a reservoir 42 miles in circumference and 35 feet in depth was constructed, to conserve the flood waters which in the dry season were conducted onto the lands, whereby the devastation by drought of that region was prevented. The Phœnicians were celebrated for their skillful and systematic manner of applying water to the lands for the purposes of irrigation.

Rome, at one time martial mistress of the world, was in Nero's time supplied with water by means of nine separate aqueducts, aggregating 255 miles in length, which delivered, according to estimates, 173,000,000 gallons of water daily. Irrigation was introduced into France by the Romans. The Nismes conduit was constructed nineteen years before Bethlehem was immortalized by the birth of Christ. This conduit delivered to the people for domestic use and to the lands for irrigation 14,000,000 gallons of water daily. China dates its early irrigation enterprises far back into remote antiquity, while numerous tanks, dams, canals, aqueducts, pipes, and pumps in Assyria, Mesopotamia, and Ceylon are evidences of an early civilization, having a more perfect knowledge of irrigation than they have ever been credited with. In fact, the historian tells us that irrigation methods antedate the most authentic history of this system of utilizing waters for reclaiming arid lands. Respecting irrigation, Cato, two hundred years B. C., wrote very intelligently about the benefits and advantages of applying water for purposes of irrigation of farm lands.

Japan is also noted for its magnificent and extensive irrigation system, and it is estimated that at least two-thirds of the 12,500,000 acres of land under cultivation, by which the population consisting of 41,000,000 of souls is sustained, are rendered fertile and productive. Even the islands of the sea, that is to say, Madagascar, Madeira, Java, and Sicily, and the island of Lombeck utilize the waters for purposes of irrigating the lands, and rely upon this system to sustain the farm and garden. Italy in the valley of the Po has engaged in irrigation since the early ages, and as late as the year A. D. 1895 the bulk of farm products in that country was the result of irrigation. Spain, since Roman and Moorish times, has engaged and is now conducting successfully and promoting irrigating systems whereby about 6,000,000 acres of land are being regularly and successfully cultivated. In India this system is said to be more extensive than in any other part of the world. From Lahore, in the northwest, to Calcutta, in the southeast, a distance of nearly 1,400 miles and covering a territory not less than 100 miles wide, a larger portion of the lands is cultivated by irrigation. The great dam at Bhutan, which supplies the Nira canals, is 4,067 feet long and 130 feet high, by means of which the waters are conserved and through these canals conveyed onto said territory for purposes of irrigation. It is also estimated that in this region 6,000,000 acres of land are annually served with water, the flowage of 300,000 shallow wells; thus it is demonstrated that wells may be resorted to as a possible means of reclaiming arid lands.

Mr. Chairman, we now turn from the Old World to the New and find that the practice of irrigation by the people of the Orient, in ancient as well as modern times, has, in a great measure, obtained and now obtains in the Occident. Mr. Prescott, in his Conquest of Peru, tells us that in Peru waters for irrigation were carried by means of canals and subterranean aqueducts on a noble scale; one of said canals traversed the district of Condesynos and is estimated to be 500 miles in length. The Argentine Republic, according to most authentic reports, has had and now has 1,759,600 acres of land under irrigation. The Spaniards were greatly surprised when they invaded Mexico to find that irrigation was extensively and very successfully conducted. In Colorado, New Mexico, and Arizona, and extending through Mexico and Central America and on into Peru, are found remains of what was once a most thorough system of utilizing the waters for reclamation of arid lands and are evidence of an early civilization in those sections of country. On both slopes of the Andes, long before occupation of that country by the Spanish and Portuguese, irrigation is shown to have flourished, as is demonstrated by prehistoric works which are found in those sections of country.

In the United States irrigation was introduced by the Mormons under Brigham Young in 1847, and the wisdom and great business ability of this man as a leader are demonstrated by the great State of Utah in all her resources of every character. Under his guidance and direction the sagebrush plain and the rugged mountain side have been transformed into beautiful farms, gardens, orchards, homes, and magnificent cities, and this has been brought about alone through the application of the methods of irrigation. Yet this great inland empire has hardly been touched. From Utah this system radiated to the States of Idaho, Montana, Nevada, California, and the Territories, to which system is due the wealth of said States and Territories, but this has taxed the ordinary flowage susceptible to appropriation by the individual to its utmost extent, and further development and improvement is impossible without a conservation of forest and stream, so as to furnish additional waters for extending to unreclaimed lands the blessings of irrigation.

Mr. Chairman, the next query that may be made by gentlemen of this House is this: Is it possible to compensate the reclamation fund by distributing the cost of constructing reservoirs, canals, conduits, and dams among the purchasers or homesteaders? And for reply to this query, will say I sincerely believe that but few, if any, of the many investments will fail to reimburse the fund, and that, taken as a whole, the proceeds of the sale of lands under all the reservoirs will more than reimburse the reclamation fund; and this fund, when reimbursed, will be enabled to construct additional reservoirs, the cost of which will again be replaced by the sale of lands under these new and additional reservoirs. Thus will the fund revolve until all available waters shall have been exhausted, and the original amount will at the close of this great work remain in the Treasury Department, subject to the disposition and will of some future Congress.

I have made these assertions because I am fully acquainted with the systems of irrigation now in use in my own and adjoining States. In my State I know of my own knowledge that hundreds of people have secured good homes and profitable farms at a very nominal cost to the individual. In most cases the cost to the rancher for water for his homestead has not cost to exceed $5 per acre, and this was paid in work by a man, or man and team, at a time when they could not utilize their labor on the farm. It would be difficult to determine the exact cost of irrigation per acre in the United States for the reason that most of these improvements have been made by contributions of labor. In foreign countries wherever the governments have inaugurated this system we have been furnished by the historian with actual cost of construction of the various reservoirs and canals. The principal ones noted by me in a most thorough search are as follows:

The Upper Ganges system in India consists of 890 miles of main canals with 3,700 tributaries, 17 immense dams, and serves 1,205,000 acres of land, the total cost of which is estimated at $14,644,000, or $12.15 per acre. The lower Ganges system consists of 531 miles of main canals, 1,854 distributaries, and serves 620,000 acres, the total cost of which was $7,000,000, or $11.29 per acre. In the Bombay Presidency, in the year 1889, out of 915,000 acres under the canals, 839,000 acres were irrigated by a system which cost $10,792,000, or $12.86 per acre. In the Punjab district the works constructed in the twelfth century, or 700 years ago, are still in use. The West Jumna Canal cost up to 1890, $8,000,000. This system embraced 84 miles of main canal, 1,110 distributaries, and served 2,000,000 acres, the average cost per acre being $4.

In France 13 different canals and reservoirs along the river Loire have been constructed, at a cost of 41,460,000 francs, and the lands thereunder increased by reason of said improvements from $44 to $300 per acre. In the Indus Valley 1.479 miles of canals, etc., were constructed, at a cost of $7,872,000, and serves 1,148,000 acres of land. The cost of said improvements per acre was $6.82. This includes the Labour branch, covering 522,000 acres. In the Maras Presidency, as reported by Richard J. Hinton, there is a population of 31,000,000 souls. This presidency has constructed a system which serves 6,000,000 acres and cost $32,488,000, or $5.41 per acre. In Denmark there are 145 miles of canals, which in 1890 carried 22,000 second-feet of water, the principal part of which was used and to be used in the reclamation of the desert of Julland, and while the historian fails to give total cost and acreage, he affirms that the lands by reason of this system advanced in value $80 per acre.

At the meeting of the Trans-Mississippi Congress, in 1901, Mr. O'Donnell gave a history of irrigation in the Yellowstone Valley, which is substantially as follows:

This valley in 1884 was an alkali desert, supporting only the buffalo and antelope. The area of this valley was estimated at 60,000 acres, all of which was comparatively worthless, which was reclaimed by means of a system which cost $250,000, or $4.16 per acre. On this small area are nine school districts and schoolhouses; it maintains a pay roll of $275,000 per annum, the aggregate value of the property at this time being estimated at $6,000,000, all of which has been the result of a disbursement of $4.16 per acre. A number of estimates have been made by the Geological Survey for reservoirs and dams along Kings River in California, one of which reservoirs, to be formed by a dam at Dusy Meadows—dam estimated at 120 feet in height, to be built of loose rock, with a storage capacity of 16,850 acre-feet—will cost, if constructed, $538,860, or $32 for each acre.

At Longs Meadow, on the same river, it is estimated that the cost of constructing irrigation works will be $28 per acre-foot. At Clarks Valley, on the same river, a reservoir with dam 85 feet high, storage capacity of 120,199 acre-feet, to cost $1,331,025, or $11.05 per acre-foot; but should this dam be made 105 feet instead of 85 feet in height, the storage capacity would be increased to 217,196 acre-feet at an estimated cost of $2,206,822, or $10.15 per acre. The Pine Flat reservoir, on the same river, to consist of a dam 140 feet high, will have a capacity of 78,197 acre-feet and is estimated to cost $1,750,000, or $22.38 per acre. These estimates seem very large, but when contrasted with the uses to which these lands may be put—that is to say, for the purpose of growing citrous fruits and grapes—the value of the land thus improved is much greater than ordinary agricultural land, orange lands frequently selling at from $200 to $400 per acre.

The San Carlos reservoir in Arizona, estimated to cost $1,040,000, will serve 100,000 acres at an average cost per acre-foot of $10.40. While these estimates as to the improvements along Kings River and also in Arizona exceed $10 per acre-foot, there are numerous long narrow valleys among the Rockies which can be irrigated at a cost of from $2 to $3 per acre, which, in my judgment, would bring the average cost of all the reservoirs down to less than $10 per acre.

Mr. Chairman, gentleman may ask, Will the people purchase and settle up these lands if reclaimed? To this we answer that twice the amount—nay, more than is susceptible to irrigation—would be eagerly sought after and filed upon immediately upon its being placed on the market. Mr. J. D. Whelpley states that on the opening of the Kiowa Reservation 167,000 people filed applications, whereas only 13,000 could be accommodated, thus showing that 154,000 people were turned away disappointed and made to follow against their wills a business other than farming. It is also shown by statistics within reach of everyone present that about 50 per cent only of the lands filed upon since 1862 to date have ever been patented—that is to say, of 1,345,000 filings, only 637,000 have ever been carried into patents.

The total number of acres covered by these filings is 180,000,000, whereas 86,000,000 acres only have been patented. This is largely due to the fact that the first settlers appropriated all of the available flowage of the various streams, thus exhausting the spring and summer flow of those streams, resulting in an abandonment of over 700,000 filings, which would now represent, had water been made available by the Government by conserving the waste waters of winter and early spring, about 700,000 farms—beautiful homes, with church spires gleaming everywhere—while villages, towns, and magnificent cities, with all incident industries, would decorate this now barren and almost worthless territory. Now, if 700,000 persons have been disappointed by failure to secure homes in the past, is it possible for us with a constantly and rapidly increasing population to form any idea as to the number of home seekers who in the future will meet like disappointments? But it would be safe to say that the number may be reckoned by millions instead of thousands, and we are confronted with the fact that with this constantly increasing demand for lands there will be a constantly decreasing supply until the whole area is exhausted.

Mr. Chairman, the arid region will not only furnish lands for the home lover and an opportunity for the home builder, but it also furnishes a climate so free from malarial conditions that diseases indigenous to lower altitudes are seldom known. The nights are almost invariably cool in a large part of this section, so that man, wearied by the labors of the day, enjoys a peaceful rest and rises in the morning invigorated for the duties of the day. Here also is a country to be enjoyed by the invalid who desires to escape the unbearable heat of the city or lower altitude, while located in this vast domain are hot springs innumerable, so celebrated for their medicinal properties and curative powers that I am inclined to believe that these were the fountains of youth to discover which Ponce de Leon made an unsuccessful search, of which he knew by tradition only, while we know that those traditions have become historic facts.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, my duty compels me to say that if we wish to expand the business of the factory by creating a market for its products; if we wish to relieve the overpopulated condition of the Eastern States; if we wish to conserve our population and prevent a large portion of it from migrating to other countries; if we wish to make valuable 55,000,000 acres of land now valueless; if we wish to construct a safeguard against Eastern drought; if home building is but another name for upbuilding of the nation, as has been asserted, and wisely too, by the President of the United States; if we would reduce the taxes of the arid West by doubling the acreage of cultivated land, we must, to accomplish these results, adopt the methods provided for in this bill as our only hope, that hope which the poet so beautifully described when he said:

Eternal hope,
When yonder spheres sublime
Pealed their first notes
To sound the march of time,
Thy joyous youth began,
But not to fade,
When all your sister planets have decayed;
When wrapt in flames,
The realms of ether glow,
And heaven's last thunder
Shakes the world below,
Thou, undismayed,
Shalt o'er the ruins smile,
And light the torch
At nature's funeral pile.

[Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment to this amendment that I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send up his amendment and it will be reported to the committee.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I understand that debate on this section is closed.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed.

At the end of section 4, page 5, line 25, add the following:

"And no contract for the construction of any irrigation works, reservoir, canals, or ditches shall be made until such proposed contract shall have been reported to and approved by Congress."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appear to have it.

Mr. RAY of New York. I call for a division.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 24, noes 70.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the entryman upon lands to be irrigated by such works shall, in addition to compliance with the homestead laws, reclaim at least one-half of the total area of his entry for agricultural purposes, and before receiving patent for the lands covered by his entry shall pay to the Government the charges apportioned against such tract, as provided in section 4. No right to the use of water for land in private ownership shall be sold for a tract exceeding 160 acres to any one landowner, and no such right shall permanently attach until all payments therefor are made. The annual installments shall be paid to the receiver of the local land office of the district in which the land is situated, and a failure to make any two payments when due shall render the entry subject to cancellation, with the forfeiture of all rights under this act, as well as of any moneys already paid thereon. All moneys received from the above sources shall be paid into the reclamation fund. Registers and receivers shall be allowed the usual commissions on all moneys paid for lands entered under this act.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 3 strike out the word "irrigable."

In lines 10, 11, and 12 strike out the words "and no such sale shall be made to any landowner unless he be an actual bona fide resident on such land, or occupant thereof residing in the neighborhood of said land."

[Mr. HEMENWAY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHAFROTH. I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado moves that debate on the pending section and amendments thereto be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. I move to amend that motion and that debate close in five minutes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I accept that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to amend by providing that debate shall close in five minutes.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Colorado as amended.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I now yield four minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I make a point of order on that.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, how did the gentleman from Wyoming get hold of that ten minutes to yield?

The CHAIRMAN. There are but five minutes, and the Chair does not think the gentleman from Wyoming is entitled to yield. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MANN, is recognized. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I should have taken up the time of the committee at this stage of the proceedings if it had not been for the splendid speech of my friend from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY]. I do not agree with him that the proposition in this bill means that the arid lands shall be irrigated at the expense of the pockets of the farmers of Indiana and Illinois. I happen to be one of the farmers of Illinois myself [laughter], and I trust the gentleman from Indiana is one of the farmers of Indiana. [Laughter.]

Under this bill there is no provision that any of the money paid into the Treasury by the farmers of Indiana and Illinois shall be used for the irrigation of the arid lands. It is proposed by the bill, substantially, that money derived from the arid lands themselves shall be used to make them irrigable.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Does not that money belong to the United States Treasury?

Mr. MANN. That is very true. The lands belong to the United States Treasury, but the lands as they are now are valueless. They will pay for themselves. But let me call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to a proposition which he might have objected to in the House.

We recently gave away all the lands in Oklahoma, lands which belonged to the Government and to the people, lands which were valuable, lands which, if they had been sold for their real value, would have put money into the pockets of the farmers of Indiana and Illinois, or saved money to their pockets; and yet there was no man in this House so small minded as to object to the provision of these people going out into the lands of the West and taking them upon the same terms that the farmers of Indiana and the farmers of Illinois obtained their lands from the Government.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Does the gentleman from Illinois want the farmers of the arid lands to take the same line that the settlers of Indiana and Illinois did when they got theirs?

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman's question answers itself. The proposition before the House shows what is desired, but the farmers of Indiana obtained their land from the Government by the grace of the Government and not in return for the payment of the value of the land. They paid practically nothing for the land.

Most of them received land for a nominal sum or for no sum at all. These lands in Indiana and Illinois belonged to the people of the country who lived to the east at that time. The people of the East, with large-minded ideas, with a splendid conception of the possibilities of the West and of the country, urged their citizens to take the lands in the West, and to-day the people of the East, with still large-minded conceptions of the possibilities of the West, propose to make the arid lands of the West bloom and blossom with the splendid results of industry. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to use the reclamation fund for the operation and maintenance of all reservoirs and irrigation works constructed under the provisions of this act: Provided, That when the payments required by this act are made for the major portion of the lands irrigated from the waters of any of the works herein provided for, then the management and operation of such irrigation works shall pass to the owners of the lands irrigated thereby, to be maintained at their expense under such form of organization and under such rules and regulations as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That the title to the reservoirs and the works necessary for their protection and operation shall remain in the Government until otherwise provided by Congress.

The following amendment was recommended by the committee:

On page 5, after the word "to," in line 22, insert "and the management and operation of."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, no measure fraught with greater moment to the country has been before this Congress. The stability of a republican form of government depends much upon the prosperity, contentment, and happiness of its people. Distress, discontent, and poverty are the enemies of good government and the breeders of anarchy and disorder. Any measure which tends to promote prosperity and happiness by benefiting any considerable number of citizens without injury to others should certainly meet with most favorable consideration at the hands of the lawmaking body.

The very essence of this bill is home building. This is its aim, purpose, and object. If it will not do this, it should be defeated. If it will do this, then the reason for its defeat must be strong and convincing. The home is the unit of our Government. It is the real source from which springs our strong and intense love for our country and its institutions. Along with the desire for liberty and the right to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience which impelled the Pilgrim Fathers to dare the dangers of a trackless sea and face the terrors of an unknown land there was also the strong hope of building homes for themselves. From that day to this we have been a home-making people. To own in his own right a plat of ground, however small; to live in his own cottage, however humble, and to sit at his own fireside with his wife and children around him has been the acme of the heart's desire of the true American.

The man who owns a home is a better man, a truer citizen, a more loyal American than he who owns none. Take the renter from the farms of the East, where the products of his labor goes to enrich another; take the laborer from the crowded tenements of the cities, where his family lives in squalor and distress, and place him on a part of our national domain with the hope of its being his own some time; let him have room to breathe the pure mountain air and drink in the unpolluted sunlight of God's blue sky, and the seeds of anarchy and lawlessness will shrink and die, while love for family and country will well up in the heart and grow stronger and stronger from day to day.

The flag of freedom will take on a better and a grander meaning to him. Its waving folds, its starry field of azure hue, and its gleaming bars will be pregnant with hope and meaning, and instead of hating he will love, instead of cursing he will praise, instead of forsaking he will protect and defend with his life. The home is the citadel of our nation, the inner fortress of our defense, the bulwark of our institutions, and the hope of our liberties.

Truly did President Roosevelt sum up the fruits of this bill when he said:

Our people as a whole will profit, for successful home-making is but another name for the upbuilding of the nation.

A NONPARTISAN MEASURE.

It is a matter of congratulation that this measure can be considered free from partisanship. It is not a political question and politics has cut no figure in its preparation and report. It is a bill framed in accordance with the demands of all political parties. The Republican party in its last platform declared:

In further pursuance of the constant policy of the Republican party to provide free homes on the public domain, we recommend adequate national legislation to reclaim the arid lands of the United States, reserving control of the distribution of water for irrigation to the respective States and Territories.

And the Democratic platform said:

We favor an intelligent system of improving the arid lands of the West, storing the waters for purposes of irrigation and the holding of such lands for actual settlers.

While this measure has not been specifically indorsed, it is believed by those who framed it to be in accordance with those platforms. It was drafted by those who are acquainted with irrigation and who are familiar with the conditions existing in the arid-land States. At the beginning of this session of Congress a committee of 17, of which I had the honor to be a member, was appointed from the different States and Territories interested in this matter to prepare a bill. This committee worked long and laboriously, and after much discussion, many compromises, and most careful consideration, this bill was unanimously agreed upon. The committee was made up without regard to politics, and in the discussion and preparation of this measure politics received no consideration whatever. It may not be—doubtless is not—a perfect measure, but we believe that it is as nearly perfect as can be secured. The defects in a proposition like this will appear only when its application is attempted, and whatever defects do appear can be, and doubtless will be, remedied by further legislation.

AN ADMINISTRATION MEASURE.

While it is true that this is not a political subject or bill, it is, nevertheless, what may be called an Administration measure. President Roosevelt, in his message to Congress, took strong grounds in favor of national aid for irrigation. He is the first President who has urged the matter in a message to Congress, and this has been one of the great factors in concentrating public sentiment upon this subject. It gave a wonderful impetus to the cause. His position is very pronounced. The subject is not referred to in his message in a merely passing way, but is given much prominence, and he discusses the matter with clearness and force, such as has not been surpassed by anyone. Our ears still ring with the arguments of the able statesmen and leaders of this House that we should stand by the Administration, even though we may not approve the measure it advocates.

While I am not one of those who think that simply because the President recommends a matter it should be passed, because I believe in the existence of the three coordinate branches of the Government and that it is the duty of the President to recommend and the duty of the legislative branch of the Government to investigate and legislate in accordance with what they deem best for the interests of the country, even though it may not be in accord with the recommendations of the President, yet those who speak so often about standing by the Administration in all things certainly should be the last ones to oppose a measure of this character, and therefore we confidently expect that those able statesmen who have grown gray in the service of their country and whose loyalty to the party and to the Administration can not be questioned will cheerfully unite in support of a measure which is so heartily indorsed and urged by the Administration

CONSTITUTIONALITY.

We are met at the threshold of the discussion of this bill with the same objection that has met every great question in the past; with the same obstacle that has been in the way of every upward and onward growth of our nation since its foundation; with the same reason that would dwarf, throttle, and destroy our national life and progress—it is unconstitutional. How often have we heard that cry! What great measure has ever been presented for our country's welfare that has not been met with this objection? The pathway of our national progress to glory and greatness is strewn with the fragments of constitutional objections.

A protective tariff, under which our home industries have been fostered and developed until we are able to supply our own markets and also reach out for the markets of the world; under which the farmer has secured a market for his produce at fair and remunerative prices; under which the manufacturer has been able to sell his products and develop and broaden his industries, and under which the laborer of the country has had his wages maintained at a scale nowhere equaled was unconstitutional. The national banking system of this country was pronounced unconstitutional. The inauguration of the system of internal improvements that has done so much for the building up of commerce and the country was unconstitutional.

The limitation placed on the extension of slavery was unconstitutional. The salvation and preservation of the Union itself was declared to have been done through unconstitutional means. The issuance and redemption of the greenbacks was unconstitutional. The throttling of polygamy at the very threshold of the national capital was unconstitutional. The growth of the nation in the acquisition of Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippines was unconstitutional. But, notwithstanding all this, the nation still lives, the Constitution still lives, and the zenith of our nation's glory has not yet been reached.

The Constitution, instead of being an instrument to strangle and destroy national growth and development, is the very soul and life of the nation in expanding and broadening as the necessities of civilization and development demand. The extent of our greatness has not yet been measured. With relentless power these constitutional quibbles have been and will be brushed aside, that our nation may grow and develop into the great Republic, the admiration and hope of mankind, the exemplar and the ideal of all liberty-loving people. That this objection to the bill under consideration will meet the same fate we do not doubt, and should the question ever come up for consideration before the Supreme Court, there can be no question but that its decision will add life and not death to the Constitution.

The President well said in his message:

It is as right for the National Government to make the streams and rivers of the arid region useful by engineering works for water storage as to make useful the rivers and harbors of the humid region by engineering works of another kind. The storing of the floods in reservoirs at the headwaters of our rivers is but an enlargement of our present policy of river control under which levees are built on the lower reaches of the same streams.

Is it true that the Government is so tied by this fundamental law that it can not improve its own property, that it can not care for its own? The mere statement of such a proposition would seem to be sufficient for its refutation.

The main purpose of this bill is to reclaim worthless property of the Government and make it valuable. The Government has constructed levees along the Mississippi River. Why? Ostensibly to aid commerce; primarily to protect farms and lands from destruction by overflow. Not public lands, either, but private lands. If the Government can do this, why can it not turn water onto its dry and worthless lands to make them valuable and productive? The Government has granted swamp lands to the States upon the condition that they will reclaim them. If it can do this, can it not provide for the irrigation and watering of its own lands in its own way and by the exercise of its own power?

The Government has granted millions of its public domain directly to railroad companies in order that roads might be built across the continent. Some there be who condemn this policy and yet no one can cross this continent and not realize the immeasurable benefit that has been brought to the nation by the construction of these roads, and no one can see the almost insurmountable difficulties encountered and overcome and not appreciate that aid of this kind was necessary to secure the early construction of these roads. What was the object of these grants? Not for the benefit of the corporation or the individual but for the benefit of the nation, for the growth and development of the people, and for the settlement and development of the public domain of the country.

If the Government can do this, if it can turn this property over to private individuals in order that its public domain may be settled, can it not take the proceeds of the sale of its public domain and use them in reclaiming these public lands? There are those who advocate the granting of a subsidy for the building up of the merchant marine. Some of those who advocate such a measure are opposed to this bill. I am in favor of the building up of the merchant marine, and I am in favor of a subsidy, if that will place the American flag upon the seas, but if we can use money of the Government for such a purpose—and I believe we can—surely the Government can use its money for reclaiming its own lands. If it can improve property of others, it certainly can improve its own. If it can pay others for improving its own property, it certainly can improve this property itself.

What is the Government? Is it not the instrument of the people? The people are not for the Government, as some seem to think, but the Government is for the people, and I believe that under our Constitution any measure that results in great good to a great number of our people and tends to make the people happier, more prosperous, and more contented will find warrant under the Constitution. If we can expend millions in aid of commerce, we certainly can expend a few millions to create commerce.

We are not without authority in support of the constitutionality of this measure. It passed the Senate with scarcely a dissenting vote. It was discussed and considered by that body, which contains some of the best constitutional lawyers of the day, and I am satisfied that if they had had any doubts as to its constitutionality those doubts would have been expressed, and I believe that we can confidently resolve the doubt, if any there be, in favor of this measure upon the authority of SPOONER as against JENKINS, and HOAR as against RAY.

PROVISIONS OF THE BILL.

Many have an erroneous idea as to the provisions of this bill and the amount of money that will be expended thereunder, and also as to the cost to the Government itself. What is the bill? What are its terms?

The moneys received from the sale and disposal of public lands in Oregon, California, Colorado, Idaho, Kansas, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming are placed in a fund called the reclamation fund, after deducting the amount necessary for the agricultural colleges and the fees and commissions of registers and receivers.

Out of this fund the National Government proceeds to construct and maintain the irrigation works provided for in the bill, which are simply the reservoirs and main-line canals. I do not attempt to disguise the fact that this is just the same in the first instance as if the money were paid into the United States Treasury and then appropriated direct by Congress. But this is not all. Whenever a Government work of reclamation is commenced or concluded, and a person takes up land to be irrigated from this work, in addition to complying with the requirements of the homestead law he must also pay to the United States Government the estimated cost of reclaiming his land.

In other words, the Government gets its money back. This payment, it may be said, however, goes into the reclamation fund to be reexpended. This is true, but whenever the Government ceases to construct irrigation works and all the land is taken and paid for the fund is entire and can be turned back into the General Treasury, so that in the end the Government will receive all of its expenditures, except, probably, such amount as may be expended for maintenance. In other words, the effect of this bill is simply to provide for a loan upon the part of the Government, without interest, in constructing these irrigation works.

It is also provided that all irrigation works constructed by the Government other than reservoirs shall pass to the owners of the lands irrigated thereby, to be maintained at their expense whenever the major portion of the land irrigated has been paid for. Consequently the only permanent expense to the Government will be from the management and operation of the reservoirs constructed and the works necessary for their protection and operation.

Home building is insured, because no one can acquire this land without living on it for five years. There can be no speculation or monopoly, because, in addition to the five years' residence, no homesteader can take more than 160 acres, and in many cases he can take no more than 40 or 80 acres. There is an absolute guarantee of home building and certain protection against land monopoly.

WORLD'S IRRIGATION.

Irrigation is not a new thing. It dates far back toward the dawn of history. Indeed, we may not be far wrong in assuming that the Garden of Eden was watered by a system of irrigation under divine control, and it may be that one of the duties placed upon Adam and Eve was to look after the ditches furnishing water for the various flowers and trees and vegetables that grew in that beautiful garden. No doubt the grapes grown in the Land of Canaan were grown under irrigation, and the children of the Land of Nod no doubt cultivated irrigated farms. The many remains of huge tanks, dams, canals, aqueducts, and other implements used in the transmission of water in Egypt, Assyria, Mesopotamia, India, Ceylon, and Italy prove that the ancients knew much of hydraulics and applied that knowledge to the fructification of their fields.

Authentic history affirms that Lake Mœris was constructed two thousand and eighty-four years before Christ for the purpose of regulating the inundations of the Nile, and under the reign of Sesostris, one thousand four hundred and ninety-one years before Christ, in Egypt a great number of canals were cut for trade and irrigation; and it is said that the first canal to connect the Red Sea with the Mediterranean was designed by him and afterwards completed under the Ptolemies. The irrigation canals of Egypt are so numerous that it is estimated that not more than one-tenth of the water which enters Egypt by the Nile finds its way to the sea. The Assyrians seem to have been equally advanced in skill and ingenuity in developing irrigation systems along the otherwise desert valleys of the Euphrates and Tigris.

Indeed, the existence of the great and populous cities which history tells us flourished in Assyria, Egypt, and these other ancient countries can not be accounted for except on the basis that the country was artificially watered. To-day in Egypt the débris of ancient cities and habitations is dug up and used as a fertilizer upon lands devoted to agriculture. What a strange commentary upon the mutations of time. It is thought that the same country in Egypt now inhabited by 5,000,000 people was, during the time of the Pharaohs, inhabited by 20,000,000. Nearly every country of the Old World furnishes evidence of the existence of irrigation works. Some of them are of prodigious and amazing extent, and the ruins of many towns and cities are silent witnesses, telling most graphically of the importance of these great works.

The Nahrawan Canal in Assyria was over 400 miles long, with a width varying from 250 to 400 feet. It served not only as the great distributer of water to the fields along its banks, but also as a great highway of commerce and was a piece of engineering skill hardly equaled by anything of its kind in these days of great engineering feats. In China irrigation has been practiced for thousands of years, and some of her canals are the most stupendous ever constructed. The great Imperial Canal has a length of over 650 miles. It is used not only for irrigation but also for transportation. We need not go to the Old World, however, for ancient irrigation.

In our own country and in South America the remains of ancient irrigation works are to be found. Even in portions of the arid country, which we to-day ask the Government to assist in reclaiming, are found the remains and banks of ancient ditches constructed by people of whom we know but little, and proving to us that this barren country was once inhabited by a prosperous and progressive people. The ruins of ancient towns and irrigating canals through Mexico and South America evidence an early civilization, perchance surpassing that of the present day. When the Spaniards invaded Peru they were astonished at the wonderful and stupendous irrigation works constructed in that country, one of these being between four and five hundred miles in length.

It is difficult to determine the area under irrigation, but according to the statements of Wilson the following estimate is given:

The total area irrigated in India is about 25,000,000 acres; in Egypt, about 6,000,000, and in Italy, about 3,700,000 acres. In Spain there are 500,000 acres; in France, 400,000 acres, and in the United States, 4,000,000 acres of irrigated land. This means that crops are grown on 40,000,000 acres which but for irrigation would be relatively barren or not profitably productive. In addition to these, there are some millions more of acres cultivated by aid of irrigation in China, Japan, Australia, Algeria, South America, and elsewhere.

The estimate for the United States should be placed at about 7,500,000 acres at the present time. In Japan about 8,000,000 acres are irrigated; in Australia, several hundred thousand acres; in South America, three or four million acres. So that we may roughly estimate about 75,000,000 acres in the world to-day under irrigation; in other words, about the amount which, it is thought, can be brought under cultivation by national irrigation in this country.

POSSIBLE AMOUNT TO BE RECLAIMED AND COST.

How much land will be reclaimed under this bill? To this question no definite or certain answer can be made. Estimates vary from 35,000,000, to 100,000,000 acres. In my judgment, 50,000,000 acres is a reasonable estimate of the lands that can be directly reclaimed through irrigation enterprises; there may be more, there may be less. If this amount should be reclaimed it would mean much to the nation. This would be equal to a body of land of over 78,000 square miles in extent, or nearly twice the area of Pennsylvania, and much larger than the State of Illinois.

About one-third of our national domain is a desert, producing naught but sage brush, grease wood, and cacti, fit only for grazing purposes, and much of it unfit for that. The greater portion of this vast territory never will be habitable, but the lands upon which water can be placed may be made as productive as the Garden of Eden itself. What can be done by irrigation is no longer a matter of speculation in this country. Private capital and private industry already have demonstrated its beneficent results. Already 7,500,000 acres have been reclaimed and made to blossom as the rose. Valleys and plains which never knew life save that of the jack rabit, the coyote, chipmunk, lizard, and horned toads are now habitations of thousands of happy and prosperous people, and cities and towns have sprung up as if by magic.

The success of further development by private capital is most doubtful. In fact, many of these enterprises in the past have been far from remunerative to the original promoters, although of incalculable benefit to the settlers, the State, and the nation. In my own county several irrigation enterprises were put through, but the original promoters were thrown into bankruptcy and the ditches into the hands of receivers. This, I am informed, has been the result in many other portions of the country. To supplement the work of private capital is the object and purpose of this bill.

The State and Territories named have an area of 1,522,145 square miles, or 974,172,800 acres, or one-third of the area of the United States, exclusive of Alaska. Of this amount a little over one-half, or 535,486,731 acres, is public land and subject to settlement and entry under the land laws of the United States. Much of this land is rough and mountainous and unfit for anything but grazing, and the remaining portion is absolutely valueless without irrigation. The first settlers, naturally, located in the valleys and along the streams. Private enterprise constructed the ditches which could be constructed at the least cost and which would cover the most land and bring the best returns. The population of these States and Territories is 7,745,291, and of this Kansas and Nebraska have about one-third, or 2,536,795.

With 50,000,000 acres irrigated and with the influence that this will exert upon the remaining portion, we may expect a wonderful increase in the population of this Territory. This land will be farmed most intensely, and probably will be equal in productive power and supportive ability to three or four times the same amount of land in the East. It also must be remembered in this connection that this Western country is surpassingly rich in everything that goes to make a populous territory, except in agricultural lands. It has unlimited mining resources; the greatest forests in the United States are found here, and along the coast the commercial facilities are unrivaled.

If the mining, manufacturing, and commercial industries are supplemented by agriculture the center of population of this country will continue to move westward, and it is not extravagant to estimate a population in this Western country within the next fifty years of twenty-five or thirty millions of people; in fact, I believe this to be a very conservative estimate. In my judgment also the irrigation of this amount of land, which is about one acre out of every ten of the arid and public lands, would not be limited in effect to lands actually irrigated, but there would be a marked effect upon the remaining portion. It would seem almost inevitable that there would be more moisture in the air, and, consequently, more precipitation.

The result of this would be the improvement of the grasses, the improvement of vegetation upon the remaining lands, and grazing would be much more extensive and profitable than at the present time. The hot winds of Kansas and Nebraska and other Middle States doubtless are largely the product of these vast, dry, hot, arid plains. If large areas are irrigated, instead of taking moisture from the air they will give out moisture, and these hot, death-laden winds will be softened and laden with health and life for man, beast, and crops. Furthermore, the irrigation of these lands does not mean simply a farm house on every 40 or 160 acres of land, but along with the farms and the mines and the manufacturing will come villages, towns, and cities. Railroads and telegraph and telephone lines will be brought into operation. Schoolhouses will be constructed, church steeples will pierce the sky, and civilization will flourish and develop where before was the solitude of the dead.

What will be the cost of this work to the Government? This is a very pertinent question, and one that can not be very definitely answered. We may get some idea, however, if we consider the cost of works already constructed in other countries, because the amount of difficulties to be encountered, the obstacles to be overcome, and the character of the work is substantially the same in all countries.

In Richard J. Hinton's report to the Senate the following facts are given as of the year 1890. In the Madras Presidency, in India, the irrigation works up to 1890 involved an investment amounting to $32,480,000, and the acreage watered was estimated at 6,000,000, or an average cost of a little over $5 per acre. This, as I understand it, included not only the main canals but also numerous laterals. The Upper Ganges system has 890 miles of main canals with 3,070 distributaries and 17 great dams, and cost $14,644,000. The number of acres served was 1,205,000, making the average cost per acre a fraction over $11.

In the Bombay Presidency the cost of the public canal is placed at $10,792,000 and the number of acres to be irrigated was 915,000, or an average cost of a fraction over $11 per acre. In Punjaub and Sind provinces the total expenditure for irrigation purposes is represented by $36,400,000, covering about 6,000,000 acres, or an average cost of $6 per acre. About one-half of this land, however, is irrigated each year. In the Indus Valley about 1,148,000 acres are irrigated, and the cost of the works up to 1890 had reached $7,872,000, or about $7 per acre.

These figures will indicate that the cost of the works proposed under the present bill will not be so large as estimated by some. It is proposed under this bill that the Government shall construct only the reservoirs and the main works, or main canals. Experience has shown that this is the least cost in reclaiming lands. I believe that many have an erroneous idea as to the extent of the Government work proposed. It is not proposed that the Government shall actually reclaim the lands; it simply constructs the reservoirs, or main line canals, so as to make the water available; the settler must do the remainder. He must build the ditches that lead the water from the reservoirs to and onto his land; he must build the ditches that lead the water from the main line canals to and onto his land; he must clear the land; he must level it and then construct the irrigating ditches to distribute the water over the land. The expense of this is very great.

As illustrating it, and as illustrating the difference in value of the land before the settler does anything to improve it and afterwards, I will give the cost of land under a large irrigation canal in my own county. Lands that are under the ditch, as we say—that is, lands that can be irrigated from the ditch—in their raw state and without any water right are worth from $5 to $10 an acre. The water right sells for $25 an acre, and this means that the water is brought within at least a half mile of the land to be irrigated, and this requires the construction of many lateral ditches from the main canal by the company itself, which is not contemplated by this bill on the part of the Government. This makes the land with the water right cost, or worth, from $30 to $35 an acre.

After the land is leveled and the lateral ditches constructed, distributing water over the land, and it is seeded to grass, it is worth from $75 to $100 an acre, and the increase in value represents very largely the actual expenditure of the farmer in putting his land to crop. From this it will be seen that the very least of the work in reclaiming is done when the Government constructs the reservoirs and main canals. The greater part must be done by the settlers themselves, and if it costs the Government $300,000,000 or $350,000,000 in the construction of its works, it means that in the reclamation of the lands the settlers will expend at least an equal amount and probably much more.

It must not be overlooked, however, that the amount to be advanced by the Government is limited to the proceeds of the public lands. It may be one, two, or three millions a year. A pitiful sum when we realize that we are to-day spending twenty-five or thirty millions a year for river and harbor improvements without hope or expectation of repayment, while in this case there is an express provision for the reimbursement of the Government.

PRIVATE ENTERPRISE CAN NOT TAKE UP THESE PROJECTS.

There are but few irrigation projects now within the possibility of private capital. Private activity does not take up any enterprise which does not offer with reasonable certainty a fair profit on the capital invested. As I already have said, the experience of irrigation companies heretofore has not been encouraging, the original promoters having made nothing, but, on the contrary, they have lost largely upon their investments. This makes capital doubly cautious. The very nature of these enterprises makes them uninviting. There must be a very great outlay before any income whatever is received. The work must be continually looked after at considerable expense whether the water is used or not.

It takes considerable time to prepare the land to be used for irrigation, and the men who take up lands are usually poor and with little capital. They develop their lands slowly, and if the water rights are purchased, the purchase must be made on long time at low rates of interest. If the water is rented and not purchased, it is rented only for the land actually cultivated, and as a result full returns do not come in for several years, and the recurrence of hard times in nine cases out of ten will bring loss and bankruptcy to the enterprise. Another difficulty is that most of the lands under such an enterprise are public lands, and these lands constitute no source of income until they are settled upon. The Government does nothing to improve the lands, buys no water rights, rents no water, and, therefore, a great portion of these lands would bring in no income whatever.

The only way that private capital could irrigate these lands would be for the Government to turn them all over to some great company. This, of course, would not be thought of for one minute. But, it is said, why not turn the lands over to the States. This is not practicable, because the States would be limited in their operations within their own boundaries. They have no revenues to be used in engaging in these enterprises, and in many of them the lands to be reclaimed would be very limited in area. Practically the same objections apply to the States taking charge of these lands as applies to the investment of private capital now. The only practical way is for the Government, as a great landowner, to do this work.

The Government does not desire a profit on its investments. The Government has never gone into a money-making scheme, and never will. Hard times would not interfere with the progress of the work. The moneys and revenues of the Government are sure. If it begins an enterprise, its continuance does not depend upon the condition of the money market or upon the prosperity of the country, nor is the matter of profit any concern. In reality, the great benefit to the Government comes from the building of the homes themselves and not from the money it receives directly. Even if the Government did not receive any direct return from the land, if a large number of prosperous homes are established the resulting benefit to the community, the county, the State, and the Government well repays for the outlay.

One of the great canals in Spain cost $4,000,000, while the produce earned by the administration of the canal amounted to only $7,400, and yet it is stated that—

The business, however, far from being ruinous for the State, has largely compensated the outlay by creating great sources of wealth which deliver up to the public treasury a good part of their income.

Make valuable that which is valueless and you enrich the nation. Increase the homes of the country and you make stronger the pillars of government. Increase the taxable property of the country and you lighten the burdens of taxation to the people and make more certain the income for schools, city, county, State, and national purposes.

OBJECTIONS TO THE BILL.

Some oppose this bill and allege that it will injure the farmer of the East and Middle West. In their zeal and intense desire for his welfare they become eloquent in portraying the sterling honesty and stalwart independence of the farmer and they agonize over his toils and woes. No one admires the farmer more than we who urge this bill; no one sympathizes more than we; none realize more that he is one of the great mainstays of our national existence than do the advocates of this bill. We believe that he and his industry constitute the basic element of our national perpetuity and prosperity. We have worked on farms and know the toils and beauties of the farmer's life, although we may not have been such great farmers as our friends from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY], Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY], Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], and New York [Mr. PAYNE].

We have not yet forgotten the days spent from early morning until late twilight behind the plow and handling the dusty hay in the hot and stuffy mow. The most vivid memories that we now have of the farmer's life are the sound of the voice that drove away sweet sleep at 4 o'clock in the morning and the groaning of the cows as they grumblingly left their warm beds on frosty mornings that we might warm our bare feet. Yes, we know something of the farmer's life, and we would do nothing to make the burden heavier; but, on the contrary, we would do all we can to make it lighter.

This bill is not for the benefit of farmers like those in this House, who own their broad acres, but who do not put the hand to the plow, swing the ax, or handle the hoe. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] is a great farmer and does not need this bill, and I am frank to say that it is not primarily for his benefit.

The great object of this bill is to furnish homes for the homeless and farms for the farmless. The renters of Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois, and laborers crowded in the tenements of the large cities are the ones for whom this bill holds out relief. I know that in Illinois the farm lands have reached exorbitant prices, and, in order that the owner may receive a tolerable percentage on a high valuation, the poor renter toils and sweats from early morning until fading twilight. He works sixteen hours a day, eight or more of which go to enrich and support his landlord. He barely makes a living for himself and family.

There are thousands of laborers in our Eastern cities whose toil brings in only enough to maintain a miserable existence for themselves and their families. Day after day the fruits of their labor go largely to enrich another. For these laborers and these renters there is but little hope for the future. There is but little hope of gratifying the great desire of every American heart—that is, the desire to have a home. To this class of people this bill offers hope. It comes as a harbinger of better days and of a better life. It offers to them a portion of God's footstool as their own and gives them the hope of an existence in which they can breathe the pure air and absorb the pure sunlight of heaven and expand and grow and develop into better men and into better citizens.

We should not look at this bill from the sole standpoint of dollars and cents, of appropriations and expenditures. It has a grander purpose and I believe there will be a grander result. The great result from this bill will be the happy homes that will be built in our own country and more loyal citizens to our flag and the principles it represents. To take the fruits of one's toil and give to another, to work from day to day and eke out a mere miserable existence for oneself and family, to live without hope of bettering one's condition, is not conducive to noble manhood or loyal citizenship.

A few years of such a life stifles and smothers the desire for something better, for something nobler, and instead of happy, loyal, and contented citizens there are discouraged, discontented, and disloyal citizens. Why? Those who live this way are without hope of anything better. For them there is no happiness; the Government means nothing to them except the agent of oppression; the flag means nothing except the emblem of tyranny. Such a condition breeds anarchy and anarchists, disorder, and revolution. The foundations of our State rest upon the home builders and the home owners, and the more of these we have the firmer the foundation, and any bill that will make more homes and more home owners will do much to solve the social problems of discontent that agitate all countries, and that are the natural product of poverty and a congested population. Its beneficent results can not be measured in dollars and cents. Manhood, patriotism, love for family, and love for country flow from such a measure, and are infinitely more to be desired than the few dollars we propose to spend.

Objection is made to the bill because it is not demanded by the needs of the present age. Never before have there been so many of our people looking for homes, and where else could they look but to the westward and to the north? As the western sun was the guide to those early pioneers who crossed the plains and scaled the mountains to find homes along the peaceful shores of the Pacific, so to-day are the homeless looking westward and northward with hope and anticipation. Last year over 12,000,000 acres of the public domain were taken by the home seeker and home builder. This was not choice land, but it probably was the pick of that which was left. Log huts have been built with their mud chimneys.

The little garden patch has been cleared and cultivated; a few cattle have been turned out upon the hills to graze, and, though the prospects may be dark, or would seem so to you and me, yet in many homes on this 12,000,000 acres of land the star of hope twinkles brightly and the spirit of liberty reigns exultant with home and independence in fruition. These settlers are better men, more loving husbands and fathers, and more loyal citizens than they were in the East or Middle West.

Thousands are going from Iowa and other States of this nation to the north, to take up lands and build up homes beneath a foreign flag.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, of Canada, said a few days ago:

I hope to have an opportunity while in England to devise some plans for the greater encouragement of emigration to Canada. Emigration from the United States, I am glad to note, is increasing every year. Fully 50,000 have gone from this country across the border during the last three years, and we will be glad to have all the fifty thousands more she can send.

This is not because they love our country less, but because there are more and better opportunities of securing homes and happiness in Canada. Let us keep them with us; let us satisfy their hopes and furnish them homes in our own land and beneath our own flag.

Not needed by the present age? The rush to Oklahoma and the crowds around the borders of every Indian reservation just before they are opened to settlement is answer sufficient and, it seems to me, shows conclusively that there is to-day a great demand for lands and that a measure of this kind can not be passed too soon in order that the congested populations of the East may find an outlet. Five hundred thousand immigrants are landing on our Eastern shore every year. They must be cared for. If they stay in the cities they simply add to the growing discontent. This is a condition that must be met, and I know of no better way than to furnish homes.

Objection is made to this bill because its benefits will be enjoyed by the few. We are almost daily appropriating thousands, yes millions, which directly benefit the few. Your millions for rivers and harbors primarily benefit a comparatively few of the people of this country, and yet we do not object to the expenditure on this account. We of the West have been cheerfully and uncomplainingly voting year in and year out in favor of the expenditure of millions of dollars of no direct benefit whatever to us.

Year in and year out we have been bearing our share of the taxes looking toward the building up of different sections of our country. We are broad minded enough to believe that any measure that is of benefit to any considerable number of our people, or that is of any considerable benefit to any section of the country, is a benefit to the whole, and many times the indirect benefit far outweighs the direct benefit. Such will be the effect of this bill and the policy thereunder. Again objection is made, and it is alleged that the farmers of the East will meet with increased competition, and an attempt is made to arouse their opposition on this account.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] says it will be a great injury to the farmers of Indiana, because it will bring increased competition with their products. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] claims that it will be an injury to the farmers of Ohio, and he read from a circular issued by the farmers of the country, protesting against the passage of this bill, because they thought they would be taxed for the benefit of the farmers who would increase competition with their products. The same cry comes from Illinois and Iowa.

This is not true. This bill is a bill for the benefit of the East and of the Middle West. Your sons and your daughters are the ones that will make homes in this far-off country. Do you care nothing for them or their future happiness and prosperity? If they are benefited and their condition improved, will that not be a benefit to you and to your part of the country? But what is there in this cry of competition? Nothing. As a matter of fact, the people of the East will be relieved from the competition of the Middle West and the people of the Middle West will have increased markets for their products. Why do I say this? Because the products that will be raised on the lands to be reclaimed under this bill are not the products that are raised in Iowa, Kansas, or Ohio, or Indiana.

We do not raise corn and wheat on irrigated lands. They are farmed too intensely for such crops to be profitable. What do we raise in this section? In the northern section we raise alfalfa, hops, fruits, and vegetables, while in the southern section we have oranges, lemons, olives, grapes, etc. Every additional family placed in this section of the country furnishes an addition to the markets for the products of Iowa and of Kansas. We ship our corn from those States.

If you place one, five, six, or ten million more people to the westward of these States they will have a market for their corn that they can get in no other way and relieve the farmers of Ohio and Indiana from that much competition, because the farmers of Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, and Missouri are the competitors of the farmers of Ohio and other Eastern States, and if you furnish them a new market to the westward the market to the eastward is relieved to that extent, so that if this bill results in the settlement and development of the Western country, instead of furnishing competition for the farmers of the Middle West it will furnish them a market, and instead of furnishing competitors for the Eastern farmers it will result in the extension of their markets.

It seems to me that a little thought, a little reasoning, and a little judgment exercised in considering this bill will show the utter fallacy of the fears expressed on behalf of the people of the East and the Middle West. Why is it that the Secretary of Agriculture, who hails from Iowa, and the Secretary of the Treasury, who also hails from Iowa, are heartily in favor of this bill? It is because that, with broad-sighted, vision they behold the great benefits that will accrue to their section of the country by reason of the development of the country farther west and the location there of a great population. They see nothing in this bill except good for the farmer of the East and the Middle West.

What other benefits would accrue? The possibilities of irrigation in the way of increasing the population is something amazing. Irrigated lands must necessarily be cultivated in small tracts and in a very careful manner. This means many homes and a dense population. In Egypt there is a population of 543 to the square mile, and yet it is estimated that the same territory in ancient times sustained and had a population of 20,000,000 of people, or nearly four times that of to-day, and to-day the land of that country is fertilized by the débris and remains of ancient cities, and the farmer, turning the soil with his plow, frequently discloses evidences of that ancient civilization which was the greatest of its day.

If we reclaim 50,000,000 acres under this bill, it would be equivalent to about 78,000 square miles of compact territory. Should this be settled as thickly as Egypt there would be a population of 42,354,000. We do not anticipate such an increase, however, as this as the result of irrigation, although it will not be at all surprising to see such a population in the States covered by this bill within the next fifty years, because it must be remembered that in addition to the wonderful resources created by the reclaiming of these worthless lands there also would be the development of almost inexhaustible resources of timber, mines, and commerce.

That vast territory has wonderful resources for the development of commerce, manufacturing, and mining. All it needs is a corresponding development in agriculture, and let me say here that the population that is certain to find its home in this country will be almost, if not entirely, sufficient to consume all of the products raised in that territory in addition to taking the products of the States of the Middle West. With 40,000,000 people westward of Iowa, Kansas, and Nebraska—yes, with 20,000,000 of people—Americans, living as Americans live, what a wonderful market there would be for the other portions of the country. Its magnitude can hardly be measured. It can not be measured except by estimating the market furnished by 20,000,000 people in the East. What an impetus would be given to the manufacturing industries of the Eastern States.

Every manufacturer and every laborer of the East especially should be heartily in favor of this bill, because almost every home built up in that country will furnish an additional market for the products owned or manufactured and means an extension of and an increased demand for labor.

I live at North Yakima, a city of 5,000 people. It is one of the most beautiful cities in the Northwest and is the center of an irrigated district. Twenty years ago the valley in which it is located was an absolute desert, covered with sagebrush. To-day it is a garden spot of beautiful homes, and contented and prosperous people have taken the place of the desert.

Are we of any benefit to the East? Go into our stores. They are filled with your products. There is your clothing of all kinds, your furniture of all kinds, your hardware of all kinds, your machinery of all kinds, your musical instruments of every kind and character, your groceries of nearly every kind, and many other products of your factories and mills. Your labor was employed in their production. Our money went to you in their purchase, and so it will be with all of the towns and cities that may grow up in this Western country.

You seek the markets of the world and are devising every way and every means to secure them. We complain because we do not have the ships of our own in order to transport our products to foreign lands and to bring the products of foreign lands to this country. The gentleman from Ohio is perfectly willing to pay out of the public Treasury several millions of dollars a year to a few of our citizens in order to develop an American merchant marine, in order that the American flag may fly at the masthead of the fleets of the world, so that our own ships may carry our own products to every port and to every clime.

I am most heartily in favor of such a policy. I believe in it; I believe that the benefits to come from it far exceed the payment of the few million dollars even to a few individuals, and I am perfectly willing to join hands with my friend from Ohio in promoting this policy, because I believe that the benefits from it will redound to the wealth, to the honor, and to the glory of our common country.

But while we are so anxious about this, it seems to me that there is more reason in the expenditure of a few millions of dollars a year for the building up and development of a far greater and a more permanent market at home, for the inauguration of and the carrying on of the policy that will cause the erection of thousands of houses and cottages around whose firesides will cluster people in whose hearts the love of our institutions and our flag will grow brighter and stronger day by day, and whose wealth, whose strength, and whose lives are ready to be offered up in support of the principles of liberty and justice and in defense of the honor of our flag and our country.

I venture to say that there is no measure that this Congress can pass or has passed that will result in such universal benefit as will come from this measure. It will benefit every section of the country. It will benefit every occupation and every industry in the land. One million American farmers in our own land will furnish a better market for our own products than a million of foreigners, and many millions of American farmers will furnish a market far exceeding even the stupendous market that we now have. But you are so afraid of our competition, why not stop foreign competition? We are importing millions of products that we should and can produce ourselves.

During the last five years the imports of agricultural products to this country have averaged over 50 per cent of the total amount of imports. In 1901 we imported $391,931,051 of foreign agricultural products. Why should we not produce these products in our own land? Are they such as we can not produce? Let us see. We import over $90,000,000 worth of sugar. We can and we ought to produce all this sugar in our own country; and in this connection the gentleman from Ohio protests against the passage of this bill because it will injure the beet-sugar industry of the Middle States, and he says it will reduce the price of sugar 1 cent on the pound.

Suppose it does this, how many million of people in the East would this benefit? How many millions of the consumers of sugar would be glad to have a reduction of 1 cent a pound on sugar? But would it injure even the beet-sugar industry? No; because it would simply take the place of the cane sugar that we import into this country. It probably would paralyze the sugar trust, but it would not injure the producers of beets, and would be welcomed as an extension of the beet-sugar industry in this country.

We imported hides and skins to the value of over $48,000,000. Pass this bill, and in a few years on the mountain sides and plains of the western part of this country we will raise all the cattle and sheep necessary to supply not only our own markets with meat, and thereby destroy the beef trust, but also the hides and skins necessary for home consumption. We will supply the market which is now supplied by foreigners to the extent of over $12,000,000 in wool, $16,000,000 in tobacco, over $3,000,000 in lemons, over $4,000,000 in seeds, and over $3,000,000 in vegetables.

But they say this bill taxes the farmers of the East and the Middle West for the benefit of the few, and they appeal to the Representatives on this floor and ask them, "Do you want to vote upon your constituency a tax for the benefit of others?" I deny that this bill means an additional taxation upon the farmers of this country; the very terms of the bill itself meet this objection. The expenditures under this bill are not made out of the Treasury of the United States. The fund is made up only of the proceeds of the sales of public lands in the arid States.

These moneys will be paid in by those who go to that country and take up the land, and any man who takes up land under one of these irrigation enterprises must pay for the land an amount equivalent to a proportionate part of the cost of the work. Oh, but you say, this is simply another way of taking the money out of the Treasury because, as this money does not go into the General Treasury, its place will have to be filled by means of another appropriation. This is true so far as the ordinary receipts derived from the sale of public lands is concerned for the time being, but this reclamation fund is growing all the time, and when the last irrigation work is complete and all the lands taken up and paid for, the fund will be ready to be turned back into the General Treasury. In other words, the Government makes a loan of the ordinary receipts from the sale of public lands and receives it back without interest.

You can not make the farmers of the East and Middle West believe that under such a system they are taxed very heavily for the benefit of others. Oh, but you say, after you get this work started you will go to Congress and ask that the settlers be relieved from making their payments, and have it done by direct appropriation from the Treasury. That is a proposition that will be met when it comes up. If Congress should decide that it was for the best to do this, it probably would be done, but it will rest with the representatives of the people, and I want to say, and I believe I speak for every member from the arid States urging the passage of this bill, that we do not have any intention of asking Congress to be relieved in this way. We believe in the terms of this bill, and we believe that they can and will be carried out to the letter.

But even if this contention were true, it would be no greater objection to the bill than it would be to many others that this Congress passes. As has been said, we appropriate millions of dollars every year for the improvement of the harbors of the country, and yet we never think of taxing these amounts up to the communities and the harbors and the industries that are benefited by these direct appropriations. The farmers of the country are never appealed to to defeat these bills because it means taxation for the benefit of some one else.

If a plea of this character were to be given force and effect scarcely any bill carrying an appropriation would pass Congress, and our industries, our business, and our improvements would be paralyzed, and instead of this being one of the most progressive and greatest nations of the earth it would be the weakest. Absolutely no objection has been urged to this bill upon its merits that has any foundation whatever in fact or in reason, and the intelligence of the people of this country will approve in unmistakable terms the enactment of this bill.

No valid objection can be urged against this bill. In the end it will cost the Government comparatively little. No additional burden by way of taxation or otherwise will be placed upon the people of any section of the country. It will bring no additional competition to the farmers of the East or the middle West. On the contrary, it will relieve some sections of the country from the competition of other sections and will tend to displace foreign agricultural products in our own markets.

The Almighty in His infinite wisdom made this great continent for the habitation of a mighty people. The eastern and middle portion has a fertile soil, a humid climate, and has been well adapted for the development of all those industries that are necessary to the well being of a great and prosperous nation. Along the western shores there is an abundance of rainfall, wonderful commercial facilities, and inexhaustible supplies of minerals and timber. Between these two sections lies a vast territory of lofty mountains, barren plains, and desert valleys. Upon barren wastes the sun of centuries has been beaming from cloudless skies, storing in wonderful abundance fertility and energy, while the rain and the snow of the mountains has ever rushed to the sea in mountain torrents unheeding the thirst of the parched earth.

The soil is fertile beyond comparison, the waters abundant, but unapplied. It would appear that the work of bringing soil and water together has been left as one of the great problems to be solved by this great people. The time has come for action, and man must take up the work and bring the elements of earth and air together.

As in many of the tales of the Arabian Nights the touch of the magic wand alone is needed to bring release to the beautiful princesses and great nobles from the vilest shapes and conditions, so all that is needed here is the magic touch of air and earth to bring forth the richest products of the soil and cause the founding of cities, towns, and villages. Only in fairy tale and story is there fitting simile to the wonderful transformation that will occur in arid America.

Pass this bill and you make "the waste places glad" and "the desert to blossom as the rose." The wealth of the nation will be increased by making valuable that which is to-day valueless. Hope will dethrone despair and cheerful confidence displace discouragement in thousands of hearts among the toilers of the land. The solitude of the desert will give way to the sweet music and hum of industry, and the great American Sahara will be succeeded by fertile fields.

Pass this bill and its beneficent influences will lighten the burdens and gladden the hearts of our people of every class and condition, largely solve the social problems of discontent that agitate our cities, strengthen the fibers of the nation, kindle anew the fires of patriotism almost smothered by poverty and distress, and give new impetus to that onward march of civilization that has been the wonder of the nineteenth century, and that will be the glory of the twentieth. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SHAFROTH. I move that all debate on the section and all amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, in the Fifty-second Congress the solicitude of that body on the subject of irrigation caused the appointment of a special committee on that subject, composed of Mr. LANHAM, of Texas; Mr. Clancy, of New York; Mr. Bretz, of Indiana; Mr. Gorman, of Michigan; Mr. Coolidge, of Massachusetts; Mr. Dixon, of Montana; Mr. Simpson, of Kansas; Mr. Pickler, of South Dakota; Mr. Randall, of Massachusetts; Mr. Curtis, of New York; Mr. Sweet, of Idaho, and Mr. Caine, of Utah, who reported in favor of a measure which will be found on page 7158 of the RECORD (proceedings of yesterday), and which I think will be found is a basis for a rational system of irrigation. I desire this House to have an opportunity to vote upon that proposition, and for the information of the House, I ask the Clerk to read amendments which I propose to offer, so as to make it conform in phraseology to suit the changed conditions—Utah, then a Territory, having been admitted as a State.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"Be it enacted, etc., That, subject to all rights, inchoate or perfected, thereto all the lands of whatever nature or description and rights thereto, including water rights, now belonging or appertaining to the United States, lying and being situated in the States of Nebraska, Nevada, South Dakota, North Dakota, Montana, Washington, Oregon, Wyoming, Idaho, Colorado, Utah, Kansas, and California, and in the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, and Oklahoma, severally, with full and complete jurisdiction thereover, be, and are hereby, granted, ceded, and confirmed to said several States and Territories, the grant to each of said States and Territories to be of the lands contained within its present boundaries and Territorial limits.

"And the President of the United States shall issue letters patent for the same to the said several States and Territories in this section designated whenever and as any of said States and Territories shall by an act of its legislature accept the disposition of the lands as herein provided, within the time hereinafter specified. This act shall in no manner affect any of the lands held by the United States for parks, naval, military, or other public purposes, nor any Indian lands, nor lands held in trust for or for use by Indians, nor mineral lands, nor shall it apply in any manner to the Territory of Alaska.

"SEC. 2. That the governors of the Territories of Arizona, Oklahoma, and New Mexico shall, within a reasonable time after the passage of this act, call special sessions, if need be, of their several legislatures to take into consideration and pass upon the provisions of this act and the questions herein submitted to them, and may from time to time call such other sessions of their respective legislatures as may be rendered necessary; and the benefits of this act shall not accrue to any State or Territory which shall not have accepted the provisions thereof within four years from its approval.

"SEC. 3. That as soon as practicable after the issuance of letters patent to any State or Territory herein mentioned, for the lands therein situate, and from time to time thereafter as occasion may require, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, at the expense of the United States, to cause to be delivered to the proper authorities of such State or Territory all maps, records, books, and papers, or certified copies thereof in case it may be necessary to retain the originals in the General Land Office, which may be necessary to such State or Territory for the proper control, administration, and disposition of such lands.

"SEC. 4. That no State or Territory accepting the cession of lands as herein provided shall in any case sell, lease, or dispose of said lands in greater quantity than 160 acres to any one person, corporation, or association, nor shall any such State or Territory in any manner impair or abridge the homestead privileges now granted to soldiers and sailors under the land laws of the United States."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, suiting the phraseology to the changed conditions, I shall offer that at the proper time as a substitute. I will not further occupy the attention of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next section of the bill.

Section 7 was read, as follows:

SEC. 7. That where in carrying out the provisions of this act it becomes necessary to acquire any rights or property, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to acquire the same for the United States by purchase or by condemnation under judicial process, and to pay from the reclamation fund the sums which may be needed for that purpose, and the United States circuit or district courts of the district wherein such property is located shall, concurrently with the courts of the State or Territory, have jurisdiction of proceedings for such condemnation, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States upon every application of the Secretary of the Interior, under this act, to cause proceedings to be commenced for condemnation within thirty days from the receipt of the application at the Department of Justice. And in all such condemnation proceedings in the United States courts the practice, pleadings, forms, and modes of proceedings in causes arising under this act shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice, pleadings, forms, and proceedings existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of the State or Territory within which such circuit or district court is held, any rule of the court to the contrary notwithstanding.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In lines 20 to 23, page 7, strike out the words "and the United States circuit or district courts of the district wherein such property is located shall, concurrently with the courts of the State or Territory, have jurisdiction of proceedings for such condemnation." And in lines 4 to 11, on page 8, strike out "And in all such condemnation proceedings in the United States courts the practice, pleadings, forms, and modes of proceedings in causes arising under this act shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice, pleadings, forms, and proceedings existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of the State or Territory within which such circuit or district court is held, any rule of the court to the contrary notwithstanding."

Mr. RAY of New York. As an amendment to the amendment of the committee, I move to strike out section 7.

The amendment of Mr. RAY of New York was read by the Clerk.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I care to say much more on this subject after what I said yesterday. One thing I will add now is that one of the best lawyers who ever sat in this House as a Representative, and he happens to be a Democrat, came to my committee room this morning and handed me a brief on this same subject and which contains some authorities that I had not happened to see, denouncing the whole proposition as unconstitutional and mere folly. I now offer this amendment to give the lawyers of the House a last chance to redeem themselves, to give them a chance to record their votes on the common-sense side of this proposition.

When this bill is written on the statute books and the Government of the United States undertakes to exercise this power, and somebody resists it and the courts denounce it as unconstitutional, you will say to yourselves, "Oh, was I simple enough to vote for such a proposition as that?" Avail yourselves of the opportunity and vote for this amendment and then refuse to vote for such a bill and such a proposition as is contained in this bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on the pending section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado moves that debate on the pending section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, it is, I understand, one of the unwritten rules of this House that new members, like the children of our Puritan forefathers, are expected to be seen, but not heard. The vital importance of the pending measure, coupled with the fact that for twenty years or more, living in the West, I have witnessed the regeneration of portions of our arid and semiarid empire by the magic process of irrigation, is my apology, if apology be necessary, for taking part in this debate.

The State of South Dakota, represented by my colleague [Mr. BURKE] and myself, as regards this subject of irrigation is a fair epitome of the entire nation. One-third of our State is a second edition of Iowa, with a rainfall of from 25 to 30 inches annually, and growing regular and bountiful crops. Another third has a rainfall of from 20 to 25 inches, and is a natural dairy country, which industry is generally established and very prosperous. The remaining third of our State, with the exception of the Black Hills mountain range, which is rich in mineral products and has ample growth of forest and forage and a generous water supply, is by nature a stock country, the grasses being less luxuriant than in the other portions of the State, but very nutritious, and adapted to sustain large numbers of stock in both winter and summer. No portion of our State is arid, but perhaps one-third might be classed as semiarid, and can be vastly improved by artificial irrigation. We are interested in this proposed legislation for the same reasons that the people of the entire country are interested in it. Our State is very prosperous under present conditions. We come, therefore, not as paupers or mendicants seeking a bounty from the Government, but as citizens of a common country supporting a great industrial policy which we believe entitled to favorable consideration in the legislative councils of a great nation.

I find, as a rule, that the men who are opposing this proposed legislation have had no opportunity to fully investigate its merits. Those who have become familiar with practical irrigation—whether they reside in the East or the West—are generally supporting this measure. There has been a great advance in public sentiment upon this question in recent years, until it is well understood throughout the country that this is one of the most important subjects for the consideration of Congress.

The Chicago Record-Herald, in an editorial on January 26, 1902, said:

> The question is now at the doors of Congress. It is in a large sense greater even than the issue of the isthmian canal. It must affect more people, build more for the nation, bring more lasting prosperity than any question now uppermost in the councils of the nation.

And the Chicago Inter-Ocean has recently declared:

> The future of arid America is the greatest and most momentous problem before the American people to-day.

No one who has never witnessed it can realize the marvelous transformation that takes place when the life-giving waters from the mountain streams are turned upon the thirsty but fertile plains. A good illustration may be observed in the Salt River Valley in Arizona. This is an extensive valley with fertile soil, but without regular rainfall, and therefore naturally devoid of vegetation; a portion of it has been reclaimed by diverting the waters of the Salt River. The lands thus reclaimed are now sustaining a population of 50,000 people, including the thriving city of Phœnix, and present an agricultural picture of great profit and rare beauty. You may there see side by side in striking contrast, the heated desert and the blooming and blossoming fields. A section line or a township line will divide these contrasted conditions. On the one side, the lands having no water privilege will be as dry and barren as a public highway; on the other side, the lands reclaimed by irrigation are fruitful orange groves, and alfalfa fields growing four and five crops per year.

The bill provides that all moneys received from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain Western States and Territories shall constitute a "reclamation fund" to be used under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior for the construction of reservoirs and main canals for the purpose of storing the flood waters of our Western streams and using them upon the arid public lands. It provides that the public lands to be reclaimed by this process can be taken only by homestead settlers in quantities of not more than 160 acres each; that each settler may acquire a water privilege to the extent of the acreage of his homestead and that he shall pay for this water privilege in 10 annual installments his proportionate amount of the cost of the construction of the reservoir and main canal. Provision is also made for sale of like water privileges for not to exceed 160 acres each to actual residents who may already have lands that may be tributary to such reservoirs. As payments shall be made for these water privileges the amounts will pass to the reclamation fund to be used in the construction of other reservoirs and canals.

The bill is drawn exclusively for the protection of the settler and actual home builder, and every possible safeguard is made against speculative ownership and the concentration of the lands or water privileges into large holdings. In prosecuting the purposes of the proposed act the Secretary of the Interior is required to proceed in conformity with the laws of the State or Territory where the lands may be situated and the water appropriated, and vested rights can not be interfered with. Provision is made that as far as practicable the major part of the receipts from the public lands in each State and Territory shall be expended in the construction of reservoirs and canals in the particular State or Territory from which such receipts are derived. The bill was prepared after careful deliberation by a committee of 17 Senators and Representatives from the Western States and Territories. It was afterwards considered with great thoroughness by the committees of both the Senate and the House.

The Government still owns about 600,000,000 acres of public lands, not counting Alaska. Of this, about 50,000,000 acres are embraced in forest reserves and about the same amount are forest lands outside of the reserves. One hundred million acres more are included in Indian reservations, military, and other public reservations, leaving, practically, 400,000,000 acres, a large portion of which is arid and semiarid lands. It is estimated that 75,000,000 acres of this may be reclaimed by using water that is now going to waste. The plan is to store the flood waters that come from the melting snows and heavy rains of the spring which now run in a flood of destruction from the mountains to the Gulf of Mexico and to the Pacific, and distribute them over the valleys and plains during the season of summer drought.

It is asked, Why must this task be undertaken by the National Government? Why can not this be accomplished by private capital and private enterprise? The reason is plain. We have wisely adopted a public-land system which permits the public land to be taken only by individual settlers in small quantities, and generally under the homestead law. The policy of the Government is to build up communities of many settlers with small holdings, and not to encourage the prosecution of agriculture by large corporations. In this day of colossal enterprises private capital could reclaim arid lands at a great profit, providing the land and water could be owned and managed by private capital on a large scale.

Under present conditions large private capital may construct reservoirs and control the water supply, but can not acquire and operate the lands. The interests of the water corporation and the settler do not coincide. The result is that there will be constant friction between the corporation and the settlers as to rates and privileges, and the relation is not satisfactory to either. Such water companies have often failed. On the contrary, I have never known an instance of failure where the settler has taken out his own water right, or where several settlers have united and taken a water right for their common benefit. Such instances are common and have created some of the most valuable property interests in the West.

But the opportunities to take water by this method of direct appropriation are practically all utilized. The remaining opportunities are confined to large streams remote from the lands to be irrigated—or to constructing large storage reservoirs to save the flood waters. The expense of such enterprises is too great to be undertaken in the first instance by the settler who is struggling to build for himself a home. The only alternative is for the Government to construct these works in the first instance, in the interest of the settler, or to abandon our public-land system and turn the public domain over to the operations of private capital. In this alternative there can be no doubt as to our public duty. No wiser piece of legislation was ever placed on our statutes than the homestead law. The public domain should be preserved for the home builder.

The opponents of this proposed legislation are laboring under some very serious misunderstandings of the real conditions involved and the real purposes of this legislation. The distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], who prepared the minority report against the bill, has said, on page 14 of the report:

> Just how the expenditure of millions of dollars of the public funds, not a penny of which is to be returned to the Treasury of the United States for the use or benefit of the people, for the improvement of the public lands will promote the general welfare is not exactly apparent. Concede for the sake of the argument that the lands will be more valuable, more desirable, more salable, and will be more speedily settled when irrigated, still it is a conceded fact that under the provisions of the bill not a penny of pecuniary profit will accrue to the people of the United States. In a pecuniary sense there is a dead loss to the people of a sum variously estimated at from one to ten billions of dollars. It may be more, but can not be less.

The bill in terms provides that each settler shall pay his portion of the cost of reclaiming the lands, thus creating an increasing reclamation fund. When the task of reclamation is entirely completed this fund will be available to the Treasury of the United States for general purposes. The gentleman says there will be a "dead loss" of "from one to ten billions of dollars," and that "it may be more, but can not be less." There is quite a large margin between one and ten billions of dollars; but the gentleman does not appear to have figured close enough to inform us whether the expenditure authorized under the bill might be more or less than one billion or ten billions. The fact is that the appropriation authorized by the bill is limited to the receipts from the sale of public lands in the particular States and Territories where these reservoirs and canals are to be constructed. No charge is made by the Government for lands which are entered under the homestead law. The receipts therefore come chiefly from lands disposed of under some other of the public-land laws. Experience has shown that the receipts from year to year average about 33⅓ cents per acre for the lands disposed of, counting in the homestead acreage with the rest.

As I have already stated, we have left only about 400,000,000 acres of unreserved public lands, and if this could all be disposed of at the average rate of 33⅓ cents per acre it would create a fund of about $133,000,000. A very large proportion of this acreage, however, is composed of arid lands which can not be reclaimed by reason of the inadequate water supply. It can not reasonably be expected that more than 100,000,000 acres of this domain can be disposed of within the next fifty years, if at all, which would create an aggregate fund of about $33,000,000. This is probably the outside limit of what can be available under the present bill, and falls far short of either one billion or ten billions of dollars.

Again, the author of the minority report, on page 16, declares:

> It is conceded on all hands that it will be utterly impracticable and usually impossible to have the reservoirs containing the water located in the same State with the land to be irrigated and some considerable portion of the irrigation works connected with and fed from such reservoirs.

This statement also is based upon an utter misapprehension of the facts. There are few, if any, cases in which the reservoirs can not be constructed in the state where the lands are to be reclaimed. The flood waters that are to be saved in almost every instance now run to waste in the natural water courses through the particular States where they will be utilized under this bill. Nevada presents the only instance of which I am aware where it may be necessary to conduct a water supply beyond the natural watersheds of those regions. That particular instance may raise some important legal questions. Under this bill the Secretary of the Interior can not interfere with vested rights or violate the State laws. It will be necessary, therefore, in the particular case referred to for the Secretary to adjust all possible conflicts before commencing construction.

The arguments advanced against this bill are twofold: First, legal—questioning the constitutionality of the measure; and, second, sectional—based upon the fear of serious competition with farmers of the Eastern and Middle States. The force of the constitutional objection is largely lost so far as the present bill is concerned, for this is not an appropriation of money directly, but of lands or, rather, their proceeds. The appropriation of public lands for educational and other purposes has been a common subject of legislation. The minority of the committee concede that the Government might grant these same lands to the States and allow them to reclaim and sell them, but deny that the Government has power to sell the public lands and use the proceeds to reclaim other lands for the occupancy of home seekers of the nation. The constitutional objection to the present bill has become, therefore, a question of form rather than substance.

The legal argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] is divided into two parts—first, an assault upon section 7 of the bill, which authorizes the Secretary of the Interior, when necessary to carry out the purposes of the bill, to acquire property rights by purchase or condemnation; and, secondly, the gentleman contends that the whole legislation proposed is unconstitutional.

This section 7, while an important one, is by no means the most important in the bill. It is drawn identically upon the plan of the general statute of eminent domain of August 1, 1888, which provides the manner in which officers of the United States, when it becomes necessary, may acquire property in furtherance of any public improvement.

It should be read in connection with section 8, which is in the nature of a limitation upon this section. Section 8 provides that the Secretary of the Interior, when proceeding under this act, must proceed in conformity with the State laws. It therefore makes, taking the two sections together, simply an instruction to the Secretary of the Interior to invoke the aid of the State laws upon the subject of eminent domain where necessary. Practically it will probably be but seldom enforced. The bill, however, would be very lame without it. I shall print with my remarks a memorandum of authorities upon the legal propositions involved in this discussion, but will not refer to them at length here.

The power of eminent domain is a necessary incident of sovereignty and is always so recognized. There is no specific grant of this power in the Constitution. The only reference to it is of a negative character in the fifth amendment to the Constitution, where it is provided that private property shall not "be taken for public use without just compensation." There was no Federal statute upon the subject until August 1, 1888—ninety-nine years after the adoption of the Constitution. The Federal Government, however, has always exercised this power, and its authority to do so has been repeatedly declared by both the Federal and State courts. For eighty years after the adoption of the Constitution the Federal authority uniformly exercised the power of eminent domain in condemnation proceedings through the medium of the State courts; but since 1880 condemnation proceedings on behalf of the General Government have been prosecuted in both State and Federal courts, according to convenience.

The subject of irrigation in the arid and semiarid States and Territories is commonly held to be a matter of public policy. The statutes of these States provide for the condemnation of reservoir sites and rights of way for canals, where necessary, in aid of persons or companies who are seeking to reclaim the arid or semiarid lands. The question whether the sovereignty of eminent domain for the purpose of promoting irrigation enterprises upon the public lands is in the State or Federal Government is unimportant. If in the State, the Government, as a landowner in the State, may apply to the State court as any other landowner may do. If the sovereignty is in the General Government, it may employ its own courts, or the courts of the State, with its consent, to administer the Federal authority.

The position of the Government as to its lands and water within the States is that of a private landowner. It has at least the same privileges as any other landowner to appropriate water for the irrigation of its lands. It may have more rights than the individual, and probably has, by reason of the constitutional authority to dispose of public lands and to provide for the general welfare. If so, it has sovereign power within a State to the extent necessary to execute this authority.

Most of the Government lands can be reclaimed without appropriating private property and especially without interfering with irrigated property, for the purpose is to utilize flood waters or other waters not now appropriated. Irrigated property must not be taken to the injury of irrigation rights now vested. Not only is this prohibited by the bill, but it would not be allowed under the general law of eminent domain—as one railroad company can not take property required by another railroad company for its operation. Interests of a similar nature must be harmonized.

The question of eminent domain as a separate proposition is not of serious importance. It all depends upon the constitutional authority to reclaim the arid lands. If there is no authority, Congress could not authorize the Secretary of the Interior to do it. If there is authority, the Government's authority is supreme, and eminent domain may be exercised in either Federal or State court. So the whole proposition really turns upon the other question which is raised as to whether or not the storage of flood waters and the reclamation of arid lands is a public purpose authorized by the Constitution. We claim it is.

It is conceded that the United States is a government with limited powers prescribed by the Constitution. An act is unconstitutional when against express provision of the Constitution, or when not included in an authority of the Constitution, either expressed or implied. The particular provisions which we claim authorize the legislation now under consideration are the following:

The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States. (Article IV, section 3, paragraph 2.)

The Congress shall have power to * * * provide for the * * * general welfare of the United States. (Article I, section 8, paragraph 1.)

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof. (Article I, section 8, paragraph 18.)

The authority "to dispose of" lands is a broad authority—much broader than to sell or transfer. Under this authority the Government may sell lands. It may also survey, mark the boundaries, lease or give away the public lands. The authority "to dispose" of the public lands carries with it power to do what acts are reasonably necessary in order to place the lands in condition that they may be disposed of. The Government may preserve and improve the public lands and make them more valuable or useful. Can not it uncover the mineral ledges in its mining regions, protect, preserve, and cultivate its forests, or bring water upon its vast acres that they may be sold? Otherwise the arid lands could never be disposed of.

The Government owns vast tracts of land which the Constitution says it may dispose of. It owns water to water these tracts. The land is valueless and useless without the water upon it; but it is contended that the Government is powerless to bring the water to the land that it may be made valuable and sold and for the benefit of the people. A nation powerless to so act for the welfare of its people would be a weak nation indeed.

Ownership and proprietorship in lands give the right to improve and sell them, inherently. The owner has a right to use his property and to do what is necessary to make it useful. This applies to the Government as well as to an individual, simply as the owner of large areas of land—without the express authority to dispose of it. Individuals may buy the arid lands of the Government and then reclaim them by irrigation under the laws of the State. Why can not the Government, merely as a landowner within the State, do the same as an individual—reclaim its own lands by irrigation projects under the State laws? Where does the individual acquire greater rights than the Government regarding lands which each may own within the State?

The power to provide for the general welfare of the entire people is one of the peculiar and important powers intrusted to Congress by the Constitution. To "promote the general welfare" was one of the purposes of forming the Constitution as set forth in the preamble. What purposes are public purposes, so that their advancement will promote the general welfare is a subject which has often been considered by the State and Federal courts. The important cases upon this subject are cited in my brief. Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, page 533, says:

The Government also provides court-houses for the administration of justice, buildings for its seminaries of instruction, aqueducts to convey pure and wholesome water into large towns; it builds levees to prevent the country being overflowed by the rising streams; it may cause drains to be constructed to relieve swamps and marshes of their stagnant water; and other measures of general utility in which the public at large are interested and which require the appropriation of private property are also within the power where they fall within the reasons underlying the cases mentioned.

The precise question as to whether the irrigation of the arid lands of the country is a public purpose has been frequently considered by the courts, and in every case the point has been decided in the affirmative. In Lewis on Eminent Domain (section 202) the proposition is thus stated:

SEC. 202. Irrigation.—The construction of canals, conduits, and other works to convey or store water for irrigation in localities where the rainfall is insufficient or too uncertain for agricultural purposes, and which are for the use of all those capable of being supplied by them upon terms which may be regulated by law, would seem to be a public use within the meaning of the Constitution. Egypt was wholly dependent upon such works for its bountiful crops, and the principle is not unlike that which applies to public drains for the reclamation of low lands.

The question was passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Fallbrook Irrigation District v. Bradley (164 U. S., 112). It was claimed that the irrigation statute of the State of California (which permits taxation and proceedings in condemnation of private property in aid of general irrigation) was in violation of the constitution of the State of California, and also in violation of the Constitution of the United States. The Supreme Court in deciding the case not only followed the decisions of the supreme court of California sustaining the legality of the statute, but proceeded further and disposed of the case independently of the California decisions on broad principles of constitutional law. I read from the decision of the court:

Irrigation is not so different from the reclamation of swamps as to require the application of other and different principles to the case. The fact that in draining swamp lands it is a necessity to drain the lands of all owners which are similarly situated goes only to the extent of the peculiarity of situation and the kind of land. Some of these swamp lands may not be nearly so wet and worthless as some others, and yet all may be so situated as to be benefited by the reclamation, and whether it is so situated or not must be a question of fact. The same reasoning applies to land which is, to some extent, arid instead of wet. Indeed, the general principle that arid lands may be provided with water and the cost thereof provided for by a general tax or by an assessment for local improvement upon the lands benefited seems to be admitted by council for the appellees. This necessarily assumes the proposition that water used for irrigation purposes upon lands which are actually arid is used for a public purpose, and the tax to pay for it is collected for a public use, and the assessment upon lands benefited is also levied for a public purpose. Taking all of the facts into consideration, as already touched upon, we have no doubt that the irrigation of really arid lands is a public purpose and the water thus used is put to public use.

The gentleman from New York concedes that this case necessarily determines that the irrigation of arid lands is a public purpose within a State; but claims that the case falls short of deciding that irrigation is a public purpose so far as the General Government is concerned. Of course, until the General Government shall pass an act authorizing the construction of national irrigation works, the question of authority to do so can not be passed upon directly by a Federal court. I submit, however, that there is no distinction in principle between the State and General Government upon this question as to whether the irrigation of arid lands is a "public purpose."

In either case the legislation will be sustained upon the principle that the public generally are interested in the reclamation of the arid lands of the country, and the general welfare is promoted thereby. The public interest is not confined to or limited by the invisible lines that mark the boundaries of States. The public lands especially belong to the people of the whole country, and a bill that proposes to reclaim the public lands is for the benefit of the people of the whole country.

Certain classes of objects or purposes may belong either to State or national authority, such as State forts or Federal forts, State roads or Federal roads, State court-houses or Federal court-houses, State irrigation or Federal irrigation.

The power to improve public lands resides somewhere. It is not in the States; they have no interest in them. It is not in the people; they have no interest, except indirectly through the Government. The power is in the United States, which has title and possession, and it may improve them for the general welfare of the whole country.

The various acts of Congress appropriating moneys to irrigate lands on Indian reservations are justified by the same authority as the present bill. The power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes (Constitution, Art. I, sec. 8) does not cover it. I know of no specific authority in the Constitution except the general-welfare clause. It may be for the general welfare of the United States to aid the Indian tribes in the art of self-support. It is certainly in furtherance of the general welfare that the nation shall multiply the facilities by which each industrious citizen can make a home for himself and his family.

A nation is interested that its people shall be healthful, educated, and prosperous. Works that tend to the public health, public education, and public prosperity are public works. The storage of spring flood waters is a great national enterprise, to save destruction in the lower Mississippi and to refresh the thirsty lands in the Northwest. One purpose is as truly public as the other. The fact that private property may be benefited indirectly by the operations of the Government does not in either case lessen nor destroy the character of the works as public works.

Government aid to irrigation has been common for ages in other countries in which irrigation is a common necessity. Is our modern nation less able from lack of constitutional power or financial ability to project important enterprises of national irrigation than were ancient Egypt and Assyria, or than are modern Spain and Italy, and Great Britain in her gigantic irrigation projects in India?

The chief opposition to this bill has been based upon the fear of competition with the Eastern farmer. The first speech of this session on the subject of irrigation was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY]. He argued that the measure is a serious menace to the farmers of Pennsylvania and other Eastern States. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] has reminded us that our farmers now produce more than we consume; that we are exporting agricultural products each year, and concludes, apparently, that the expansion of agriculture should be checked. It seems to me that these views are narrow and ill-advised.

I have taken some pains to investigate the possible competition with Eastern agriculture from this movement. In 1901 there were in the United States 84,204,100 acres in corn cultivation, yielding 2,105,102,516 bushels. It is estimated that this bill will create a reclamation fund of $2,500,000 annually, and that it will cost $10 per acre to reclaim the arid lands. If this be approximately correct we can reclaim 250,000 acres per year. If this were all devoted to the cultivation of corn and should produce at the same rate as our present cornfields, it would increase the corn product, as compared to our present crop, in the proportion of 1 bushel to 336 bushels. It is like adding another bucket of water to Lake Michigan and expecting an overflow. The same year we had 43,519,125 acres in wheat and raised a crop of 522,229,505 bushels. Upon the same basis of calculation, if we should devote the lands reclaimed each year to wheat growing we would add to the wheat crop annually 1 bushel for every 174 bushels now produced.

But of course we could not devote the entire reclaimed land to both wheat and corn the same year. As a matter of fact, these arid lands are not adapted to the growing of wheat, corn, and other cereals on a large scale. The conditions of altitude and climate where these lands are situated are such that they will never compete with the farm lands of humid regions in producing cereal products for the American and foreign markets. In the south the chief product will be tropical and semitropical fruits and in the north alfalfa and other hay forage to support in winter the herds of live stock which feed upon the ranges in summer. The vegetable and cereal products of that region will be entirely consumed locally by the new towns and cities that will spring up in the vicinity of these new settlements and by people engaged in the mining industry.

These new settlements will prove a great benefit to the manufacturing districts of the Eastern and Middle States by creating additional markets for their products. Our best market in America is our home market. Our foreign market is for our surplus. The more that we can consume at home the better it is for the manufacturer and for the farmer who lives close to the factory, and has his home market in feeding the laborer engaged in the factory. Ask your manufacturers where they have found the best markets for their products, and they will tell you they have found it in the developing communities of the Western States. As a rule, the Western people are liberal buyers. The new settlements of the West must be supplied with manufactured articles from the States to the east of us—saddles, harness, wagons, plows, implements of all kinds, furniture, cloth fabrics; in fact, everything except what they eat, and much that they eat.

If the opening of new lands for American homes would reduce somewhat the price of farm products, that is no sufficient argument against it. If 1 bushel of wheat or corn is raised in Iowa, another in South Dakota, and as a result the price of the Iowa bushel is lowered 1, 2, or 3 cents a bushel, that is no argument against raising the bushel in South Dakota. The nation has 2 bushels instead of 1, and the combined wealth of the nation is increased thereby. Adam Smith's definition of national wealth was a nation's ability to sustain population, and no better definition has yet been found.

America now produces vastly more than she consumes. Yankee ingenuity, supplemented by the superior skill of the American laborer, has invaded the markets of the world. We now export annually about one-third of our manufactured agricultural products. But that is no reason for closing our factories or abandoning our farms. The phenomenal balance of export trade in favor of the United States in recent years is one of the most important factors in the nation's increasing wealth. This growing export trade is bringing independence to the American farmer and is multiplying the comforts and conveniences of the American laborer. State lines are not barriers to our common progress. They are purely imaginary and invisible lines, as invisible as the meridians that mark the passing out.

The marvelous industrial progress of recent years could not have been accomplished if each State had been jealous of the other. Our progress has been made by developing the nation as a whole. The prosperity of California is the prosperity of Massachusetts and of every State lying between. The nation is greater than any of its parts. We have one flag, one people, one country, and one destiny. The statesman who builds on a narrower plan has not yet caught the inspiration of the day and generation in which we are living. He has not yet heard the inimitable music to which the industrial hosts of America are marching to the peaceful conquest of the commerce of the world.

The opening of new lands to settlement is not for the benefit of the people now living in these Western States, but for the home seekers of every city and county throughout the Union. Last year about 3,000,000 acres of land were opened to homestead settlement in Oklahoma. Settlers flocked to these lands from every State in the Union. Only 13,000 entries could be made. There were 70,000 applicants for these entries, or more than 5 settlers for each claim that could be taken.

The unit of American greatness is the American home. The strongest anchorage of the nation is that which ties each man and his family to one spot of earth called home. In times of public storm and stress it holds the nation firmly and safely upon its foundations. Each new American home creates a new life center of good citizenship, from which may radiate the influences that promote the best things in the life of the State and the nation.

Our homestead law was adopted in 1862. The nation was in civil war and in serious financial straits at the time. The temptation was great to sell our public lands at the highest price obtainable. The Congress, led by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW], whose venerable presence is still spared to us to lend dignity and wisdom to the councils of this body, wisely concluded to adopt the broader policy. Congress then decided to encourage the home seeker to build up settlement, and that the nation would reap its reward in the greater national benefits that come from permanent and prosperous communities. Verily, it was "bread cast upon the waters," and we are finding it "after many days."

This legislation is in the interest of the home seekers of the overcrowded cities of the Eastern and Middle States. They are the beneficiaries as well as the present residents of the arid and semiarid States. As President Roosevelt has well said in his first message to Congress:

> Our people as a whole will profit, for successful home making is but another name for the upbuilding of the nation.

It has been repeatedly stated in this debate that this bill proposes to tax the East for the benefit of the West. The bill proposes to tax nobody. It proposes to devote public lands, which belong to the people of the whole country, to the development of other public lands, which will continue to belong to the people of the whole country until disposed of. The people living in these particular States certainly have as great interest in these lands as people living outside of these States. We do not claim that they have any other or greater interest.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that it seems to me most unfortunate that this debate has assumed as it has progressed a sectional aspect. Our country is entirely too great, this bill and what it seeks to accomplish is entirely too national, to have its merits clouded by partisan or sectional debate. The truth is that the statesmen of America in planning for the future invariably fall short of the reality as the future is unfolded in the achievements of our country. Ninety-nine years ago all of the vast territory to which this legislation refers was purchased for $15,000,000, which seemed an amount so large that it staggered the statesmanship of a century ago. Jefferson and Madison and Livingstone were criticised, and epithets were attached to them because of their work in that regard, and yet what has the future developed? The future has developed that 12 States have already been carved out of that Louisiana territory, and there are still three Territories remaining.

One of those States, Missouri, pays into the Treasury of the United States every twelve months in internal revenue a sum larger than the entire Louisiana territory cost. These arid and semiarid States alone that will be most immediately affected by this bill pay into the Treasury of the United States under the internal-revenue laws each twelve months all that the Louisiana territory cost. The new Commonwealth of South Dakota, which my colleague and myself here represent, produced in cereals, live stock, minerals, and other products in the last year $113,000,000, nearly eight times as much as the Louisiana territory cost, and so I beseech you gentlemen of the intermediate States and of the East to take a national view of this proposition and do not confine your horizon for American achievements to the limits of a State alone.

Mr. TONGUE. I would inquire of the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, how much of that $113,000,000 are expended in the East for manufactured goods?

Mr. MARTIN. A large amount of it, but that has been touched upon. It is urged against this bill that it is a Western measure. I deny that it is a Western measure alone. It is a national measure; but, gentlemen, worse things might be said against any piece of Congressional legislation than that it would benefit the West of this country. [Applause.] One hundred years ago all there was of this Republic was thirteen States down along the Atlantic seaboard. The indomitable spirit of enterprise and adventure which has made American civilization great among the civilizations of the earth seized upon our forefathers, and the long train of white movers' wagons began the ascent of the eastern slope of the Alleghenies, and moved on to take possession of the fertile sections of the central Mississippi and Ohio Valley States.

Fifty years ago the Western man crossed the Missouri River, traversed the great plains, scaled that mightiest and noblest of mountain ranges, the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevadas, and proceeded to the conquest of the Pacific slope. Think what has been the progress of the country from that moment until now!

Championed by the immortal Lincoln, our first transcontinental railroad was constructed, connecting the Western and Eastern oceans. From that time forth "the West" and "the East" have been mere relative terms. Any place between New York and San Francisco is West, and any place between San Francisco and New York is East.

The center of population is gradually approaching the east bank of the Mississippi River. It will eventually correspond with the geographical center of the United States.

During the last half century the West has produced $4,000,000,000 in gold and silver and made it possible to maintain our currency on a specie basis, and now to maintain the gold standard in common with the best commercial nations of the world. The little county in which I live has produced one hundred millions of gold, and will continue its contribution of more than ten millions per year.

The West makes no apology for being. It is the natural offspring of the East and the South. Heroes of the Revolutionary war settled the fertile valleys of Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, and Illinois; surviving heroes of the war of the rebellion cast their fortunes in the States and Territories of the intermountain West. Sons of the old North and the old South, the differences of their ancestors forgotten or forgiven, are united heart to heart and shoulder to shoulder in the material, intellectual, and moral upbuilding of this new world. The splendid stock has not degenerated by transfer to these new fields. The developing citizenship of that region is what may be expected when we remember its ancestry. Measured by the tests of intelligence and patriotism, it compares favorably with other portions of the Union. If you will consult the recent census, and from our 45 States select the 20 States that show the lowest percentage of illiteracy you will find that 12 of the 20 are States included in the provisions of this bill. When the recent test of patriotism was upon us in the Spanish-American war, the West responded in full measure of quantity and quality.

New home making upon the public lands under the present conditions has about reached its limit. The only way to considerably enlarge this privilege is by conserving the water torrents that now run their course of waste and destruction and pouring them upon the thirsty but fertile plains and valleys of the West. So reclaimed these lands will support a large population and will relieve our overcrowded cities. Let us signalize the opening years of this new century by adopting a broad national policy that will insure to every industrious American for another half century, at least, an opportunity to establish a home of his own and to enjoy the added independence and higher citizenship that come to himself and his family from its possession. [Applause.]

Memorandum of legal authorities upon constitutionality of the bill.

EMINENT DOMAIN.

No direct grant of the power of eminent domain is given in the Constitution; it follows as incidental to other powers therein granted and has an incident of sovereignty. (United States v. Gettysburg Electric Railway Company, 160 U. S., 681; United States v. Jones, 109 U. S., 513, 518.)

The United States has power of eminent domain so far as it is necessary to exercise the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution, and may exercise it in its own courts. (Kohl v. United States, 91 U. S., 367, 372; Cherokee Nation v. Southern Kansas Railway Company, 135 U. S., 641, 656; Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U. S., 282; United States v. Gettysburg Electric Railway Company, 160 U. S., 668, 679; Trombley v. Humphrey, 23 Mich., 471, 476, 479.)

The Federal Government may use the machinery of the State courts to appropriate private property for public use. (United States v. Jones, 109 U. S., 513, 520; Reddall v. Regan, 14 Md., 444; Orr v. Quimby, 54 N. H., 590; Gilmer v. Lime Point, 18 Cal., 229; Railroad Company v. Lowe, 114 U. S., 531, 532; Burt v. Insurance Company, 106 Mass., 356; Lewis Eminent Domain, sec. 203.)

The extent to which property shall be taken for public use rests wholly in legislative discretion. (Shoemaker v. United States, 147 United States, 282, 298; United States v. Gettysburg Electric Railway Company, 160 U. S., 668.)

GENERAL-WELFARE CLAUSE.

When Congress declares that a purpose is a public purpose its judgment will be respected by the courts unless the claim be palpably without reasonable foundation. (United States v. Gettysburg Railway Company, 160 U. S., 680; Gilmer v. Lime Point, 18 Cal., 252.)

In the following cases various objects are held to be public purposes:

United States v. Great Falls Manufacturing Company, 112 U. S., 645. (Water for the city of Washington.)

Reddall v. Regan, 14 Md., 444. (Water for the city of Washington.)

Gilmer v. Lime Point, 18 Cal., 229. (Military fort.)

Kohl v. United States, 91 U. S., 367. (Site for public building in the city of Cincinnati.)

Cherokee Nation v. Southern Kansas Railway Company, 135 U. S., 641, 656. (Right of way for railroad.)

Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U. S., 282. (The Rock Creek Park.)

United States v. Gettysburg Electric Railroad Company, 160 U. S., 668, 679, 681, 682. (Tablets and monuments memorial of the battle of Gettysburg upon the theory that it would tend to the cultivation of patriotism among the people.)

United States v. Jones, 109 U. S., 513, 520. (A canal to connect Green Bay with Wisconsin River.)

Orr v. Quimby, 54 N. H., 590. (United States Coast Survey.)

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] to strike out section 7.

The motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That nothing in this act shall be construed as affecting or intended to affect or to in any way interfere with the laws of any State or Territory relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water used in irrigation, but State and Territorial laws shall govern and control in the appropriation, use, and distribution of the waters rendered available by the works constructed under the provisions of this act: Provided, That the right to the use of water acquired under the provisions of this act shall be appurtenant to the land irrigated, and beneficial use shall be the basis, the measure, and the limit of the right.

The following committee amendments were read:

After the word "irrigation," in line 16, insert "or any vested right acquired thereunder."

Strike out all of lines 17, 18, 19, and 20 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and the Secretary of the Interior, in carrying out the provisions of this act, shall proceed in conformity with such laws, and nothing herein shall in any way affect any right of any State or of the Federal Government or of any land owner, appropriator, or user of water in, to, or from any interstate stream or the waters thereof."

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate what was said by the gentleman who has just taken his seat about the character of the men who settled this country, up, at least, to the margin of the Missouri River. Of course they are entitled to a great deal of credit, but I should like to remind the gentleman that they went into that wilderness and subdued it with their own means. They bought what they had and they own in that way, as the result of their own toil, all that they have. They did not come to the Government as mendicants, under a specious and false pretext, to get the Government to improve their lands.

I want to call the attention of gentlemen to the contributions that some of these States will make to this fund. Take the State of Nevada, for instance, and appropriate every dollar from the proceeds of the sales of public lands, and how far will that go toward the creation of this reservoir fund? Last year the Government received from the sale of lands from the State of Nevada $9,300. What the cost of administration that you have exempted from this fund amounted to I do not know; but I imagine there is a deficit as against the Government and that the contributions of Nevada are nil to this fund. So with the State of Wyoming.

Mr. NEWLANDS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Nevada?

Mr. HEPBURN. I prefer not to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is exceedingly liberal with other people's money. What will the State of Wyoming contribute to this fund? The whole of the sums received for the sale of public lands last year was $188,000, and of that from mineral lands, from stone lands, and from coal lands, $113,000; so that less than $75,000 would be contributed to this fund.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HEPBURN. I prefer not to. The gentleman is exceedingly solicitous that men upon this side shall not talk, and therefore I do not choose to yield the little time that I can filch from his zeal to answer his questions.

I insist now, as I have before, that this is a thinly veneered and thinly disguised attempt to make the Government, from its general fund, pay for this great work—great in extent, great in expenditure, but not great in results. There can not be extraordinary results from it, in my judgment. Certainly there can be no return to the General Government. The lands that are to be affected by it, I again say, are in private hands. They are not Government lands; they are lands that you own now, and you are trying to compel the General Government to improve your lands. It is a spectacle that never has been presented before to the American people. Every one of you knows that these sums realized from the sale of public lands are covered into the Treasury of the United States as a part of miscellaneous receipts. They are a part of the common treasure. The only difference is that you will interrupt them in their passage and lay your hands of spoliation upon them before they get into the Treasury. That is all. It is none the less a filching from the common fund. [Applause.]

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Chairman, I congratulate this House and the country upon the fact that at last Congress is ready and willing to do something for irrigation. For a great many years the honest, industrious citizenship of Westland has been appealing to the National Government for relief, but not until to-day has the appeal received any definite recognition. At first only a few tillers of the soil, ardent lovers of agriculture, who by experience and practical demonstration knew the value of water to arid and semiarid lands, began the agitation; but as years grew on apace and the Republic became educated to the belief that irrigation was not only practicable but profitable, the small band of irrigation teachers swelled into a multitude until to-day there is not a State or Territory in the Union where enthusiastic advocates of irrigation are not preaching and practicing the theory. We are now requested to pass this legislation by boards of trade as well as by farmers; by merchants as well as by agricultural societies; by labor organizations as well as by commercial bodies and banks.

The demand has become so general that it must be heeded by Congress, and I expect when the vote is taken to-day a very large majority of the members of this House will vote for the bill. It is not a political or partisan question, for people of all parties ask it. The national platforms of the two great political parties in 1900 declared in no uncertain tone in favor of the Government, by suitable legislation, reclaiming arid and semiarid lands and holding the same for actual settlers.

Note the plank in the Republican national platform:

In further pursuance of the constant policy of the Republican party to provide free homes on the public domain, we recommend adequate national legislation to reclaim the arid lands of the United States, reserving control of the distribution of water for irrigation to the respective States and Territories.

Democratic:

We favor an intelligent system of improving the arid lands of the West, storing the waters for purposes of irrigation, and the holding of such lands for actual settlers.

For years prior to 1900 the Senators and Members of Congress representing States and districts containing lands subject to reclamation by irrigation, by voice and pen sought Government recognition, and by State and interstate organizations impressed upon the Government and the people of the country the importance of this legislation, and, last but not least, the President of the United States, Theodore Roosevelt, who, by ranch life in the Dakotas and by travel through arid lands, is fully qualified and competent to pass upon this question, brought the subject to the attention of Congress in that remarkable state paper his message when the Fifty-seventh Congress first convened in session; and allow me to pause long enough to say that President Roosevelt, by this recognition of irrigation, is more responsible than anyone else for the law we are about to enact, for without his suggestions, advice, and influence I fear the friends of irrigation would have followed a forlorn hope. By his action he has earned the lasting gratitude of the patriotic people of the great West, and his political future is safe in their hands.

I quote from his message:

Public opinion throughout the United States has moved steadily toward a just appreciation of the value of forests, whether planted or of natural growth. The great part played by them in the creation and maintenance of the national wealth is now more fully realized than ever before.

Wise forest protection does not mean the withdrawal of forest resources, whether of wood, water, or grass, from contributing their full share to the welfare of the people, but, on the contrary, gives the assurance of larger and more certain supplies. The fundamental idea of forestry is the perpetuation of forests by use. Forest protection is not an end of itself; it is a means to increase and sustain the resources of our country and the industries which depend upon them. The preservation of our forests is an imperative business necessity. We have come to see clearly that whatever destroys the forests, except to make way for agriculture, threatens our well-being.

The forests are natural reservoirs. By restraining the streams in flood and replenishing them in drought they make possible the use of waters otherwise wasted. They prevent the soil from washing, and so protect the storage reservoirs from filling up with silt. Forest conservation is therefore an essential condition of water conservation.

The forests alone can not, however, fully regulate and conserve the waters of the arid region. Great storage works are necessary to equalize the flow of streams and to save the flood waters. Their construction has been conclusively shown to be an undertaking too vast for private effort. Nor can it be best accomplished by the individual States acting alone. Far-reaching interstate problems are involved; and the resources of single States would often be inadequate. It is properly a national function, at least in some of its features. It is as right for the National Government to make the streams and rivers of the arid region useful by engineering works for water storage as to make useful the rivers and harbors of the humid region by engineering works of another kind. The storing of the floods in reservoirs at the headwaters of our rivers is but an enlargement of our present policy of river control, under which levees are built on the lower reaches of the same streams.

The Government should construct and maintain these reservoirs as it does other public works. Where their purpose is to regulate the flow of streams, the water should be turned freely into the channels in the dry season to take the same course under the same laws as the natural flow.

The reclamation of the unsettled arid public lands presents a different problem. Here it is not enough to regulate the flow of streams. The object of the Government is to dispose of the land to settlers who will build homes upon it. To accomplish this object water must be brought within their reach.

The pioneer settlers on the arid public domain chose their homes along streams from which they could themselves divert the water to reclaim their holdings. Such opportunities are practically gone. There remain, however, vast areas of public land which can be made available for homestead settlement, but only by reservoirs and main-line canals impracticable for private enterprise. There irrigation works should be built by the National Government. The lands reclaimed by them should be reserved by the Government for actual settlers, and the cost of construction should, so far as possible, be repaid by the land reclaimed. The distribution of the water, the division of the streams among irrigators, should be left to the settlers themselves, in conformity with State laws and without interference with those laws or with vested right. The policy of the National Government should be to aid irrigation in the several States and Territories in such manner as will enable the people in the local communities to help themselves and as will stimulate needed reforms in the State laws and regulations governing irrigation.

Irrigation was known to the inhabitants of the East thousands of years ago. Even in America, before the time of Columbus, irrigation ditches were dug. In Egypt, India, China, and Japan the people centuries ago knew the benefits of irrigation and indulged in it to a greater extent in proportion to the population than do the inhabitants of those countries to-day. There, as here, however, the system of ditches, canals, and dikes increased with the population and wealth of the country. In Egypt irrigation was and is a necessity. Without it there can be no crops, and hence no people. Last summer I had the pleasure of traveling many miles along the banks of the Nile, and I saw a practical demonstration of irrigation which would convince even my good friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], that, Constitution or no Constitution, the scheme was practical, profitable, and a good thing for the country—miles and miles of ditches and canals; a multitude of people happy and contented as they planted a crop which they knew would grow and be harvested; water in plenty, under absolute control and proof against eternal sunshine. I saw immense storage reservoirs, constructed by British capital at a cost of millions of dollars, strong enough to stand storm and age and large enough to hold all the water needed to irrigate the country in that vicinity whenever moisture becomes a necessity. I saw the benefits of irrigation in India, China, and Japan, without which countless millions would starve and industry and enterprise go into bankruptcy. Much could be said about irrigation in other lands, but my time is limited and you are anxious for a vote.

What is irrigation? My friend Mr. NEWLANDS, the distinguished member from Nevada, who, by the way, should be a happy man this day, as he has been one of the firm friends of irrigation from the start, has given you his idea of its definition, and I am so well satisfied with it that I incorporate it here:

Irrigation is practiced only in arid and semiarid countries where the rainfall is either entirely lacking or is insufficient to raise crops. In our arid region there is a heavy deposit of snow during the winter on the mountains. This snow melting forms streams, which are torrential in the spring and early summer, but dry, or nearly so, later in the season. For irrigation the water is taken out of such streams by canals and ditches and distributed over the land. The difficulty is that the water is abundant when it is least needed and scant when it is necessary to mature the crop. The aim, therefore, is to store in reservoirs the water that runs to waste during the flood season. To do this the various watersheds must be treated in a scientific way. The ground must be accurately surveyed and located so as to store the greatest quantity of water at the most available places. The idea is that the Government should do the primary work of constructing the reservoirs and larger canals, so that the water may be brought within the reach of those who are to settle on the public lands and use it in their reclamation and cultivation.

Storage enables the utilization of a greater amount of the torrential waters in irrigating the arid plains, as the stored waters supplement the torrential waters later on and ripen the crops, which would otherwise be burned by the hot sun. Storage involves the treatment of an entire watershed in a scientific way, regardless of State lines. The problem is to maintain an equal and sustained flow of the streams, so that the torrential waters may be kept from flowing to waste and may be conserved and let into the stream when the natural supply is exceedingly limited. Very large rivers have numerous tributaries, with their sources in the snows of the mountains. The more water there is stored the greater the extent of the torrential waters that can be utilized in irrigation, for storage guarantees the service of water when it is most needed, and settlers can safely take out the torrential waters in the spring and bring larger areas of land under cultivation when they feel assured that the stored waters will come on later in a period of drought and furnish the crops with the needed moisture.

Why is irrigation a necessity? When our forefathers came to America they settled along the coast line of the Atlantic Ocean, and as population increased settlements moved westward. In time the fertile lands of America became peopled and gradually increased in price. When farm lands in New England became too valuable they were sold, and the sons and daughters in search of cheaper lands invested their money in the Middle West, while the farmer of Ohio and Illinois sent his children to States farther West. We now have 80,000,000 people in America. The choicest farm lands have been tickled with the hoe until they have laughed their holders into fortunes or into a desire to sell a small farm for a large one, in order that they may obtain large acreage for a small price. But no farmer will sell good land with the expectation of continuing in the agricultural business unless he is assured of other lands suitable to his wants.

To-day in order to do this he must go to Canada and buy cheap lands or have arid or semiarid lands irrigated and invest in them. I regret to say that because we have delayed recognizing irrigation thousands of splendid American citizens have sold their valuable farms in the West for from $50 to $100 per acre and moved to Canada, where they were offered land for $5 and $6 per acre, good wheat land to be sure, but incomparable to the semiarid lands of Nebraska when under irrigation, not to mention the loss of American citizenship. No, my friends, let us keep our boys at home by irrigating millions of acres in the great West as a habitation for them. This legislation will not injure the farmers of New England and the East, and President Roosevelt has explained this better than I can do it.

In his message to Congress President Roosevelt pointed out clearly the reasons why the Eastern farmers will not be injured by further irrigation development in the West, when he said, "The reclamation and settlement of the arid lands will enrich every portion of our country, just as the settlement of the Ohio and Mississippi valleys brought prosperity to the Atlantic States. The increased demand for manufactured articles will stimulate industrial production, while wider home markets and the trade of Asia will consume the larger food supplies and effectually prevent Western competition with Eastern agriculture. Indeed, the products of irrigation will be consumed chiefly in upbuilding local centers of mining and other industries which would otherwise not come into existence at all. Our people as a whole will profit, for successful homemaking is but another name for the upbuilding of the nation."

The principal objection raised by the opponents to this measure is its expense and unconstitutionality. These opponents do not complain of the expense authorized by this bill, but say that to continue the work authorized by this legislation will bankrupt the Government. Why borrow trouble? If this legislation meets the expectations of its friends, in a very short time it will be self-sustaining. If, on the other hand, all we hope for comes to naught and the scheme proves to be impracticable, a future Congress can very easily repeal this legislation. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], who leads the fight on this floor against irrigation, admits in his report that irrigation will make productive millions of acres. I quote from page 4:

It is asserted that if the proceeds of the public lands are wisely used in the construction and operation of suitable irrigation works, including reservoirs for the storage of water, artesian wells for pumping water out of the earth, and ditches and canals for conducting water from place to place, millions of acres of unproductive land will be made fertile and opened up to settlement, thus providing homes for millions of people. It can not be doubted that millions of acres of land in the States and Territories named may be made productive by suitable irrigation works, provided an ample and continuous water supply can be obtained.

He also admits, on page 5 of the same report, that irrigation will enhance the value of all lands irrigated.

The construction of these irrigation works and reservoirs at the public expense will inure to their benefit, for it will bring their lands into the market at twenty times their present value.

In these admissions he destroys his own case unless his view of the Constitution, always the last stand of a man who does not know his subject, protects him. Daniel Webster knew the Constitution, could expound it to the satisfaction of patriots, if not always to courts. I refer my friend to the following:

Hayne had asked, "What interest has South Carolina in a canal in Ohio?" Webster replied:

"Sir, we narrow-minded people of New England do not reason thus. Our notion of things is entirely different. We look upon the States not as separated, but as united. * * * In whatever is within the proper sphere of the constitutional power of this Government we look upon the States as one. We do not impose geographical limits to our patriotic feeling or regard; we do not follow rivers and mountains and lines of latitude to find boundaries beyond which public improvements do not benefit us. * * * Sir, if a railroad or canal, beginning in South Carolina and ending in South Carolina, appeared to me to be of national importance and national magnitude, believing as I do that the power of Government extends to works of that description, if I were to stand up here and ask what interest has Massachusetts in a railroad in South Carolina, I should not be willing to face my constituents."

In all frankness let me say to my constitutional friends that the Supreme Court of the United States represents all the people when it comes to construing the Constitution, and very seldom does that body of learned jurists agree upon constitutional constructions. In nearly every case brought before that tribunal, where constitutional grounds are discussed, able counsel, representing opposite sides, argue with vehemence and sincerity in favor of their respective propositions, and the court finally settles the point by a majority vote. I am in favor of granting to my friends upon this floor who throw the Constitution at us so often a place with the minority, and the friends of irrigation will take their chances with the United States Supreme Court as a body if after the passage of this act it becomes necessary to test its constitutionality.

In conclusion, I am proud of the fact that the entire delegation from Nebraska—two Senators and six Members of Congress—has been foremost in the fight for irrigation, and I rejoice that a Republican President and a Republican Congress have given this legislation to the people. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], in charge of this bill on the floor of the House, so admirably describes the location of arid and semiarid lands in America and the acreage to be reclaimed that I quote from his report to the House on S. 3057:

The thirteen States and three Territories named in the bill contain 974,172,800 acres of land, or 1,522,145 square miles, a little more than one-half of the entire area of the United States exclusive of Alaska. Of this territory, 318,042,901 acres are in private ownership, 120,643,168 acres are reserved for various purposes, and 535,486,731 acres, or a little over one-sixth of the entire area of the country exclusive of Alaska, are subject to entry under the various land laws.

Of the States named, Kansas and Nebraska contain no lands which, strictly speaking, are arid, though nearly one-third of the Western portion of each State is semiarid, and a considerable portion of these semiarid lands are susceptible of irrigation. The amount of land remaining in public ownership in these States is comparatively small—in Nebraska about one-tenth and in Kansas a considerably smaller proportion.

Over one-third of North and South Dakota are within the arid and semiarid belt. The portions of the States of Oregon and Washington lying west of the Cascade Range have a humid climate, while the portions lying east of the range, comprising considerably over one-half of the territory of the two States, are arid or semiarid. In California arid and semiarid conditions exist over two-thirds of the State, while nearly one-third of Oklahoma is semiarid in c racter The other States and Territories named in the bill are wholly within the arid region, and, except within limited areas affected by local conditions, agriculture can only be successfully carried on within their borders under irrigation.

Of the public lands subject to entry in the region referred to, but an infinitesimal portion has sufficient rainfall to produce with reasonable certainty the ordinary agricultural crops without irrigation. It is true there are some areas of timbered lands in Washington, Oregon, and Idaho which, when cleared, will produce crops without irrigation, and here and there throughout the entire region small detached tracts which, by reason of local conditions favorable to precipitation and retention of moisture, will yield fair returns of certain classes of farm products, but these areas, taken altogether, are so comparatively limited in extent as to constitute relatively unimportant factors in the agricultural development of the region or the nation.

A very considerable portion of these lands is rough, rocky, and mountainous and of very little value for any purpose. A still larger portion will never be of any value except for grazing purposes, while the area which is possible of reclamation by irrigation is comparatively small.

In forty years of unwearying effort the American pioneer has irrigated in this region about 7,500,000 acres of land. The acreage under irrigation at this time in the States and Territories affected by the bill is approximately as follows:

Irrigated acreage by States and Territories.

	Acres.		Acres.
Arizona	185,396	North Dakota	5,202
California	1,446,119	Oregon	388,198
Colorado	1,611,271	Oklahoma	2,761
Idaho	602,548	South Dakota	43,010
Kansas	26,497	Utah	629,273
Montana	970,231	Washington	135,936
Nebraska	148,538	Wyoming	606,942
Nevada	504,168
New Mexico	204,508	Total	7,510,598

AMOUNT OF LAND WHICH MAY BE IRRIGATED IN THE FUTURE.

As to the amount of land which may ultimately be reclaimed by irrigation, estimates have been made all the way from 35,000,000 to 70,000,000 acres. This seeming divergence of opinion is more apparent than real, as the amount of the estimate depends upon whether it is made with reference to the distant future when all available water supplies will be utilized, some of it at a cost which under present conditions would be entirely prohibitive, or is made on the basis of the area which may be irrigated at a cost warranted by present conditions or such as are likely to obtain within the next two or three decades. From the latter standpoint the smaller acreage above stated is undoubtedly abundantly high, while looking into the distant future, when a vast increase of population will warrant large expenditures and we have learned to practice the greatest economy in the use of water in irrigation, the larger figure is probably not an excessive one to measure the area which will ultimately be irrigated in the arid and semiarid regions of the United States.

Of the 16 States and Territories named in the bill, in all save 4 more than half of their area is owned by the National Government. In half of them Uncle Sam owns 85 per cent of all the land, while in 4 less than 8 per cent of all the lands are in private ownership and taxable, as shown by the following table:

State.	In private ownership.	Reserved.	Subject to entry.	Total.	Amount in public ownership.

It will be readily understood that with no source of revenue for the irrigation of these lands except ordinary taxation and with but a small portion of their lands taxable the States can not by any possibility secure funds to carry on reclamation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, it is said that a fellow-feeling makes us wondrous kind. I live along the bank of the Mississippi River, in that great region which is annually visited by devastating floods, and I presume the fact that I have entirely too much water in my region of country makes me sympathetic for those who have no water.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me a little bit ungenerous on the part of the gentleman from Iowa——

Mr. HEPBURN. I just want to remind the gentleman that he is proposing to kill the goose that lays the golden egg. If they stop the water up at its source the gentleman will have no pretext for the usual expenditure down in his bailiwick.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised at the profound ignorance of the hydraulics of the Mississippi River displayed by the gentleman from Iowa, who has been making us speeches about that river for many years. In a recent speech, when the river and harbor bill was under discussion, he fell into several egregious errors about the commerce and navigability of the river which I had the honor to correct, and now he would have us believe that the waters from the arid States, if impounded in reservoirs, would materially diminish the floods of the lower river and render unnecessary the usual expenditures in my bailiwick. This error would be pardonable in some men—and, indeed, many others share it with Mr. HEPBURN—but from the man who year after year raises his powerful and eloquent voice in opposition to the Mississippi River and does his utmost to prevent any expenditure of public money thereon I think it is absolutely without any excuse or justification.

What is the truth of this matter? Why, sir, the floods on the lower river are caused by waters from the Ohio River and its great tributaries, the Tennessee and the Cumberland; second, by heavy rains in the central valley; third, by the Upper Mississippi; fourth and least, by the Missouri River east of Kansas City. The effect of the melting snows of the Rocky Mountains is inappreciable, and what water there is from that source comes after the dangerous spring floods have subsided. Do not take my word for this, but examine the report of Humphrey and Abbot on the Mississippi River, pages 384 et seq.; also Bulletin E, Department of Agriculture, for 1897, pages 46 et seq.; also Appendix PP to Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers for 1898, pages 2862 et seq.

Humphrey and Abbot say that the only practicable site for reservoirs, to be of any real benefit in restraining the floods in the lower river, is in the Ohio River basin, as the character of basins of the Upper Mississippi and Lower Missouri is such that the reservoir system is impracticable in them. Bulletin E is an exhaustive study of the floods of the Mississippi River, their causes, etc., and was prepared by Mr. Park Morrill, under the direction of Mr. Willis L. Moore, Chief of the Weather Bureau. All of the great floods of the past twenty-five years are carefully studied from the actual and very complete data of the Bureau, and a perusal of same will convince even Colonel HEPBURN that the author's conclusions are correct. He says:

It is, of course, conceivable that a flood should occur in the Lower Mississippi from heavy precipitation over any of the great contributary basins. In these floods of the past quarter century we do not, however, find the western tributaries playing an important part. The great source of floods is the Ohio basin, with its steep slopes from the crest of the Alleghanies, upon which fall the heaviest rains of spring, at a time when the normal rise of the Lower Mississippi brings the river almost to the danger line from Cairo to the Gulf. In the greatest floods we also find that heavy rainfall over the great swamp region that extends along the Mississippi from the mouth of the Ohio to the Gulf of Mexico is an important factor. Third in importance as a factor in producing floods is the Upper Mississippi, which, while never discharging a volume sufficient to produce of itself a flood, yet, rising later than the Ohio, serves to prolong the high water and thus to increase the overflow.

Thus, according to this author, the western tributaries have not been an important factor in the floods of the past twenty-five years and are not enumerated by him in assigning their causes.

An authority equally as high as Messrs. Humphrey and Abbot and Moore and Morrill is Lieut. Col. Hiram R. Chittenden, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, who made an elaborate study of the Mississippi and Missouri River floods in connection with an examination for reservoir sites in Wyoming and Colorado. He is a strong friend to irrigation of the arid lands by Government aid, and had the facts warranted it, would have been delighted to show that reservoirs would diminish floods. In Appendix PP, above mentioned, he says:

Few people have any adequate conception of either the origin or the magnitude of great floods like those on the Lower Mississippi. It is a common error to think that they come largely from the melting snows in the mountains, yet the floods of the Mississippi nearly all come at seasons when the flow from the mountains is very small. In the greatest known flood of the Mississippi at St. Louis, that of 1844, a large part of which came from the Missouri, the latter stream was found by pilots to be in low-water stage above Sioux City. On the occasion of the late heavy flood in the Mississippi, when at its maximum stage, the Arkansas carried practically no water across the Kansas-Colorado line, the Platte did not run above 2,000 cubic feet per second at North Platte, Nebr., and the Upper Missouri and Yellowstone were both in low-water stage. The floods of the Mississippi do not come from this direction. They are formed by the heavy rains in the low regions east of the ninety-eighth meridian, and very largely come from east of the Mississippi itself. The great controlling element, in fact, in all the lower river floods is the Ohio river.

The magnitude of these floods also depends very largely upon fortuitous combinations of the floods in its tributaries. No single flood from any one of these tributaries, except the Ohio, can produce serious consequence in the main river. But if two or more of them discharge excessive floods in the main stream simultaneously, then it is that great disasters follow. Very fortunately, nature has caused these flood waves to arrive generally at different periods, and the more disastrous combinations are not of frequent occurrence.

It is apparent, therefore, that a reservoir system which should exercise any appreciable influence on the lower-river floods must embrace the three great upper tributaries, and particularly the Ohio.

I think, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that in supporting this bill for restraining the floods of my great river I am not killing the goose that lays the golden egg. I am not stopping those floods at their source, and so far as this bill is concerned I will have the same excuse as of old for the usual expenditures in my bailiwick.

I place my support of this measure on entirely different and, I hope, higher grounds than self-interest.

Our Government is owner of 600,000,000 acres of land in the arid regions, 74,000,000 of which can be irrigated. It has the same right to improve its property that any private owner has. Being a large proprietor of worthless land which brings no revenue and is worse than useless in its present condition, it would seem the part of wisdom to improve this land and have it settled by thrifty people who will be an honor and help to our country.

This is what any prudent business man would do, especially if he could operate on a plan which would not require him to draw on his other resources, but was such that the land would improve itself. If this be true of an individual it must be true of the Government, because its inherent powers over its own property are certainly as great as those of one of its citizens. If we seek for special constitutional warrant for this bill it is found in the general welfare clause of Article I, section 8 of our Constitution and in section 3 of Article IV, which says that Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property of the United States.

But if we concede that Congress has the right to do this, is such action wise and proper at this time? The plan of the present bill is to dedicate all the public lands in the arid and semiarid States to irrigation except 5 per cent of the proceeds of sale of same, which is reserved for education. Where can we find a precedent for such action? In the grant or donation of 197,000,000 acres of public land to the railroads of the country to aid in their construction. Of this amount 35,000,000 acres were forfeited by subsequent legislation, leaving unforfeited 162,000,000, of which 96,683,201.1 acres have been patented, and 65,316,798.82 acres are yet unpatented.

You will get some idea of the magnitude of these railroad grants by reflecting that the entire area of the great State of New York contains only 31,468,800 acres, and that New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Maryland combined contain only 94,499,200 acres, or over 2,000,000 acres less than have actually been patented to railroads, without considering the additional 65,316,798.82 acres which they have a right to patent. This total area, given as a free donation to the railroads, is greater than six States the size of Ohio, and more than twice as great as can ever be irrigated in the entire West.

I believe these railroad grants were wise and that they resulted very beneficially to our Union. But for them the development of some of our most prosperous States would have been slow and painful in the extreme, and where there are now populous cities and fertile fields the coyote and buffalo would roam in freedom over their native heath. It was necessary to give these vast tracts, equal in area, as I have shown, to six times the size of Ohio, in order that the other portion of the public domain might become valuable, in order that cheap homes might be found for the sturdy immigrants flocking to our shores, and for the strenuous boys and girls of our Eastern cities and farms, and in order that we might span our continent and connect the oceans of the Orient and Occident with bands of steel. Much objection was urged at the time to these grants, but I believe it is now generally conceded that no better use could have been made of our public lands.

Another precedent is in the vast swamp-land grants given to 15 of our States, amounting to 60,115,714.08 acres. This would be an average of 4,000,000 acres to each State if divided equally. My own State of Louisiana received 9,132,018.94 acres of these swamp lands, and Florida received 17,162,798.52, making for the two States 26,294,817.46 acres, or nearly one-half of the whole. And why was the Government so liberal to Louisiana and Florida? Were these two States favorite children who were receiving undue shares of the parental estate? By no means. The land was given because it was swamp land and worthless to the Union, and it was hoped that the States would reclaim it and render it valuable.

Louisiana spent enormous sums in levee building to protect its lands from overflow of the Mississippi River, and as the levees were completed much of this swamp land was reclaimed and sold, the proceeds thereof going to build new levees, which in turn protected other lands. The first swamp grant to Louisiana was in 1849, over half a century ago. The process of land reclamation is still going on actively, and will continue to go on for many years before the wise and benevolent purpose of the Government in donating this land to Louisiana shall have been accomplished. Certainly no man can question the wisdom of this grant, because this land was utterly unfit for homesteads or for any purpose whatsoever in the hands of the National Government, and the State was enabled to reclaim it only by a vast expenditure of money. The reclamation process was very slow, having already lasted over fifty years; but it was not as slow, in my judgment, as irrigation will be.

To my mind there is great similarity between these railroad grants of lands, practically worthless until the roads were constructed; the swamp lands, actually worthless until reclaimed by heavy expenditures, and the arid lands of the West, which are now barren wastes and will remain so until redeemed by irrigation. If the policy was wise and constitutional in one case, it will be in the other. These arid lands have no value to the Government now, and, unless they are irrigated, will always be worthless. I consider that in dedicating all the public lands in these 13 States and 3 Territories to the redemption by irrigation of the 74,000,000 acres susceptible of redemption, the Government will be acting as a farseeing, prudent business man.

It is true that there are about 600,000,000 acres of public lands in these States and Territories, but only 74,000,000 acres, according to the Geological Survey and Secretary of the Interior, can ever be redeemed and made suitable for agriculture. Some of the remainder is valuable for its minerals and for grazing. There is no danger of vast quantities of cheap land being thrown on the market, as once happened in the early days of the development of our great Middle West. Irrigation is at best a very slow and expensive business. All that the Government would do in most places would be to construct reservoirs to impound the waters. This would cost an average of $4 to $5 per acre, which would be a charge on the land benefited and would have to be repaid by the settler at the rate of one-tenth annually for ten years.

In addition, the settler would have to level his land and excavate irrigation ditches to convey the water from the river or reservoir to his land, and this cost would be $15 to $20 per acre additional, so that every acre of his land would cost him at least $20, or an average probably of $25. This presents a very different situation from that of the homesteader on the fertile plains of Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, for example, who got the finest land on earth absolutely free of cost. Of course, the rush to those lands was great and rapid, but $25 per acre is a different thing. Moreover, even if money could be found at once to construct these vast reservoir dams, it would take many years to complete them and put the lands in condition for profitable irrigation.

The process will be a slow and tedious one. The man who gets the benefit of these reservoirs will pay out three dollars for every dollar paid by the Government, and he will not have a soft snap by any means. I sympathize with him, for I live where the Government pays to keep the water of the Mississippi from flooding our lands and destroying us, and we have to pay more than two dollars for every dollar of Uncle Sam for the same purpose. We are gradually getting protection and our lands are coming into the market—some 20,000,000 acres in the overflowed area—but no one dreads our competition, as all realize the slowness of our growth and the costly sacrifices we are forced to make for our lands. Our brethren in the irrigation area will have a similar burden at the outset, and their progress will be slow.

One very important consideration in this bill which does not apply to the railroad and swamp land grants is this: As public lands are sold in the arid region the proceeds thereof are to be used by Government officials to construct reservoirs for impounding the water in localities where it will do the most good, and the lands irrigated by each particular reservoir are to be charged with the cost of same. To illustrate let us assume that reservoir "A" costs $500,000 and irrigates 100,000 acres. That will be $5 per acre, and when the homesteader settles on this land he must pay for it $5 per acre in addition to the usual fees under the homestead laws. If any of this 100,000 acres happens to belong to individuals when the reservoir is constructed, it will be charged $5 per acre before any water can be used. This price is paid in ten annual payments of 50 cents per acre, so that it is not especially burdensome. Thus all expense of the reservoirs will be refunded to the Government, which will eventually receive back every dollar expended.

Mr. Chairman, from whatever point of view this bill is considered it is wise and just, in my opinion, and I sincerely hope it will pass. [Loud applause.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding to end of line 5, section 8, page 9, the following:

"Provided further, That Congress shall, for the purpose of equitable distribution, have the absolute jurisdiction and control of the previously unappropriated waters of the rivers and streams flowing past, through, or from any State or Territory of the United States into, through, or past any other State or Territory and necessary for the purposes of navigation or irrigation and to which waters others have rights by prior appropriation."

The CHAIRMAN. There are three committee amendments pending that will have to be disposed of before action upon this amendment can be taken. The question is on the adoption of the amendments of the committee.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is debate closed?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed, by order of the committee, on this section; and the question is now on the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RODEY. On that I want to be heard.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed by order of the committee. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask unanimous consent to explain it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Regular order!

Mr. RODEY. I ask every member to vote against that amendment. It is just an outrage upon New Mexico.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Insert a new section, to be known as section 9:

"SEC. 9. That it is hereby declared to be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, in carrying out the provisions of this act, so far as the same may be practicable and subject to the existence of feasible irrigation projects, to expend the major portion of the funds arising from the sale of public lands within each State and Territory hereinbefore named for the benefit of arid and semiarid lands within the limits of such State or Territory: Provided, That the Secretary may temporarily use such portion of said funds for the benefit of arid or semiarid lands in any particular State or Territory hereinbefore named as he may deem advisable, but when so used the excess shall be restored to the fund as soon as practicable, to the end that ultimately, and in any event within each ten-year period after the passage of this act, the expenditures for the benefit of the said States and Territories shall be equalized according to the proportions and subject to the conditions as to practicability and feasibility aforesaid."

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I do not suppose those who favor this bill will pay any attention to propositions to perfect or amend. If the bill goes through that seems to be all they want, regardless of consequences to follow. Allow me to call attention to section 8 in connection with section 9. What laws are to govern and apply in the execution of this bill? The laws of the State in which the water, in which the reservoirs, or in which the canals may be? Do gentlemen know of any two States in this Union that have like laws? We are to take water in California and store it there. That water is to be controlled by the laws of California. A canal from that reservoir is to run into the State of Nevada, and the State laws of the State of Nevada are to control the canal and water when it gets there. And so in some other State like Wyoming you store the waters in one State and the laws of that State control the waters while there. The water is carried into and through another State and the laws of that State control while it is there. The water runs into a third State, where it is to be distributed in irrigating the land, and the laws of that third State control the distribution, and yet gentlemen think that it will be practicable to put this bill into operation. It can not be done under this bill as it stands.

The United States Government surrenders all control. Congress surrenders all control. The laws of the several States are to control. I simply point this out to you, gentlemen, because when this law is written on the statute book it will be impossible of execution until amended and changed. Any lawyer who studies all of these peculiar provisions will be astounded at its impracticability and conflicting provisions.

I have no idea that these amendments to the Senate bill, which have been adopted by the House committee in order to avoid insuperable objections which have been presented, will be adopted by the Senate. The Senate will have a substitute. It will have something to put in the place of this, because I believe that it is now agreed, both by the majority of the Senate and the majority of the House, that in any event this robbery or looting of the Treasury of the United States must be authorized before this Congress adjourns. [Applause.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND and Mr. NEWLANDS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Utah——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the Chair had already recognized the gentleman from Nevada.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had already recognized the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the gentleman from Utah make the motion?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending section be closed in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Utah moves that all debate on the section and the pending amendment be closed in five minutes.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important question, and I move to make it fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves to amend by making it fifteen minutes.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by making it seconds.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Utah moves that debate on the pending section and amendments be closed in five minutes, and the gentleman from Iowa moves to amend by making it thirty seconds. The amendment is accepted by the gentleman from Utah, and the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Utah as amended.

The question was taken, and the motion as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will take advantage of the general leave to print. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to perform any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect.

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Chairman, has the House voted on the proposed amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has voted on all the committee amendments, and at the close of debate will vote upon the section which has just been read.

Mr. SHAFROTH. This is section 10, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that what the Chair supposed was section 9 of the bill was really a committee amendment, and the vote will have to be taken on that first, so that the question is on agreeing to section 9.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order. We have passed that section and gone to section 10 without adopting the amendment, and section 10 has been read and is being debated, and I insist that it is now too late to go back and amend section 9 after we have passed to section 10, which has been read and an amendment proposed and debate has commenced upon it.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, that objection is obviated from the fact that the Chair supposed, when it directed the Clerk to read section 10, that section 9 had been adopted. Of course the Chair has a right to correct his own error.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was under the impression that it was a regular section of the bill, and having been read, was adopted. The Chair is now informed that it was a committee amendment. The Chair does not think the gentleman from New York can take advantage of a wrong impression of the Chair as to the character of the provision.

Mr. RAY of New York. I beg the pardon of the Chair. I have the highest respect for the Chair, but it is no more a mistake of the Chair than it is a mistake of any member of the House or of the friends of this bill. I insist that members of the House—— [Cries of "Regular order!" "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. This amendment is a committee amendment submitted by the committee, and the Chair thinks that it was his duty to put the amendment without attention being called to it. But under the impression that it was a part of the bill, and was agreed to when read, the chairman directed the Clerk to read section 10. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. RAY of New York. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. My inquiry, Mr. Chairman, is, Does the Chair hold that it has the power now, under present conditions, without unanimous consent, to go back to section 9 (I believe that is the section) and put the proposed amendment to a vote? Does the Chair hold that?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that it having been passed by an error of the Chair, and under a misunderstanding or misapprehension, the committee can go back—can return to the amendment and vote upon it.

Mr. RAY of New York. Does the Chair hold that the committee can go back?

The CHAIRMAN. Can go back and vote upon it.

Mr. RAY of New York. Without unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. Without unanimous consent.

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, I enter my protest.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, the debate, I believe, was not closed on the ninth section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that upon that paragraph debate was closed on motion of the gentleman from Utah as amended by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HEPBURN. I believe that was the eighth section.

The CHAIRMAN. It was the ninth, as the Chair is informed by the Clerk. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COWHERD. Now, Mr. Chairman, have I the floor on section 10?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized, and, as the Chair understands, moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, I feel in this matter very much like the gentleman from Indiana, that this bill is going to pass and that I want to get on record in regard to it before it does pass. But differing from him, I wish to be recorded in its favor; and it is so very seldom that we on this side of the House have an opportunity to speak in favor of a measure which passes that I do not want to lose this rare opportunity.

I have been very much interested in the pleading of the distinguished farmer from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and the distinguished farmer from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that we should not bring more land into competition with the lands of the farmers in their districts. Why, Mr. Chairman, how long has it been since the cry was made for the farmers up in New England that they would be ruined by competition with the rich agricultural lands of the West? Yet the New England farmer, having been brought into competition with the farmer of the West, promptly abandoned those rocky hillsides upon which you had to shoot the corn into the crevices with a Gatling gun and cultivate it with a diamond drill [laughter], and went into other business; and he has been lending money to the farmer of the West ever since. [Laughter and applause.] He went into the business of passing tariff bills and legislating for the New England farmer; and while in New England the hours of labor are limited to eight, and he needs only half that time to make a living, out West we have to work fourteen hours every day in order to get enough to eat and to pay our interest to the New England farmer who has been lending us money. [Laughter.]

These gentlemen need not be solicitous in regard to the farmers of their own country. I have no doubt that should the farming of their region prove unprofitable (which it will not) the distinguished farmer from New York can pass the bill of which he is the author and which is now pending before the committee of which the farmer from Ohio is chairman, which will take about $180,000,000 out of the pockets of the people of this country for the benefit of an industry of the East. Yet these gentlemen rise and tell us what a heinous offense it is if the people of this country are taxed—and, mind you, the bill does not propose that—some four or five million dollars for the purpose of reclaiming 60,000,000 acres of land out West and benefiting untold millions of settlers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no sympathy with the narrow views of those who hold that any part of this country can be greatly benefited without that benefit inuring to every acre of every State in the Union. We are not 45 warring principalities, with adverse interest, striving to build up this industry and to tear down that. But whenever you bring prosperity—how many times have those gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber hammered this doctrine into us—whenever you bring prosperity to any section of the country you bring it to every other section. You can not produce a tree full of blushing peaches yonder in Wyoming or plant with pineapples an acre of the everglades of Florida but that the farmers and merchants of my section will both divide the fruit and divide the prosperity. But, Mr. Chairman, I stand here, not to represent the interests particularly of the semiarid and the arid States. However great may be our affection for those people, I am for this bill because it is for the advantage of the people I represent on this floor. Out there in Missouri and in those lands that the gentleman from Iowa represents—and I was surprised to hear him opposing the measure—out there we have the most fertile soil that lies under God's shining sun.

But we suffer from two extremes—first, flood, and second, drought. Last year we had a drought which careful men estimated cost the farmers in the Middle West more in three months than they lost during all of the four years of the devastating civil war. We have every spring a flood that takes away thousands upon thousands of acres of land—and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] has told us of it in this Chamber more eloquently than I could ever hope to tell—that goes rushing down the valley of the Missouri, destroying the farms and the crops and pouring its silt and its flood into the Mississippi and carrying the besom of destruction clear to the Gulf. Store these waters at the fountain source, store them in the mountains, distribute them over those arid and semiarid lands, and what will be the result? In the first place, you will stop the floods; in the next place, as they are distributed through these lands that now lie there glistening in the sun, gathering up the sun's rays, heating the air so that the passing breeze becomes a simoon sweeping on to our destruction—water these lands and instead of the simoon of the desert, burning and blistering our crops, there will come the healing and the healthful winds, bringing with them the bountiful rains. [Applause.] I am in favor of this bill, both for the benefit of the arid lands and for my own State. It only means that the Government shall use the money it derives from the sale of these lands to make salable lands now worthless, to make fertile lands now sterile, and to give homes to people now homeless.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Chairman, it is safe to say that in its final results no bill of a public nature has come or is likely to come before the present Congress which is more important than the irrigation bill now under consideration. It proposes the expenditure in the aggregate of a large sum of money, and it proposes ultimately and in the aggregate the addition of a large body of land to the cultivatable area of the United States, but the expenditure of the money does not contemplate any attack upon the general Treasury; the reclamation of the land does not contemplate any sudden or violent addition to the farms of the country.

WHAT THE BILL PROPOSES.

We propose to take the money derived from the sale of the public lands in the sixteen arid-land States and Territories and create a fund to be used for the purpose of rendering this land useful and habitable. In these sixteen States and Territories there are 600,000,000 acres of public lands. After fifty years of effort upon the part of the people there has been cultivated and irrigated only about 7,500,000 acres. The smaller streams have been appropriated and diverted to the last drop. Private enterprise has constructed many canals from the larger streams and many reservoirs for the impounding of the flood waters. The time has arrived, however, when practically nothing more can be done in the direction of an increase of the water supply and the consequent increase in the area of cultivated lands without the aid of the National Government.

WORK OF THE WESTERN PIONEER.

The public lands in this country available for agricultural purposes are being rapidly exhausted. The limit of new settlement has been nearly reached. The Western pioneer, that picturesque and splendid figure of the forties, the fifties, the sixties, the seventies, and the eighties, is already of the past, because there are no new worlds for his restless feet. The tide of immigration which more than a generation ago swept beyond the Missouri up the colossal heights and down the somber canyons of the Rockies, across the sage-brush plains of the Great Salt Lake Basin, over the Sierras to the perpetual summer of the Pacific coast, met the Western ocean and was rolled back to the Missouri again, filling in its ebb and flow every nook and cranny of that great rainless empire where water could be found to redeem the desert.

The pioneer was splendidly independent. He asked help of none. He lobbied for no appropriation. He found himself face to face with the problem of creating a home from the raw elements about him. He threw down the gauge of battle to the forces of nature. He made his attack with the courage of creative genius. He asked no questions; sought no truce. He toiled under the pitiless sun from the beginning of spring to the middle of autumn. His back was bent and his hands were seamed and calloused with the labor of the conflict.

With his few imperfect tools he builded dams, excavated canals, constructed ditches, plowed and cultivated the soil. He transformed the mountain valleys—dry and desolate—into green fields and leafy orchards. In the beginning his eye beheld nothing but the monotonous and unsmiling gray of the sage brush. The soil was parched and barren. He tickled it with the plow and gave it the stream to drink, and made it laugh in golden ripples to the autumn breezes.

It is a marvel that, unaided, he did so much. It would be a miracle if, unaided, he had done more.

THE MORMON PIONEERS THE ORIGNAL IRRIGATORS.

The first irrigators upon American soil were the Mormon pioneers of 1847. After a toilsome march, lasting many weeks, across the Great Plains, on July 24 of that year they entered the valley of the Salt Lake. What is to-day, in my judgment, the most beautiful valley in all the world was then a barren, unproductive desert. Not a green thing was to be seen save the sparse growth of willows and cottonwoods which fringed the banks of the streams.

The Mormon people, with that courage and persistence and industry which has always characterized them, entered upon what appeared to be a hopeless task. In the early years their struggles were pathetic. Time and again the task to which they had set themselves appeared to be hopeless, but with grim determination they struggled on. Their reward finally came.

The visitor of to-day beholds the valley transformed and glorified by irrigation. About the beautiful city, with its wide streets, its running, limpid streams, its flower gardens, its orchards, its splendid and imposing temple, its shimmering spires, splendid institutions of learning, its business houses, commodious and comfortable homes, and everything which goes to make up the modern city, lie rich lands in checkerboards of varying shades of green. It is a living argument in favor of this bill, a magnificent illustration of what may be done when idle water is united with idle land. The story of the conquest of Utah is so simply and yet so graphically told by one of the pioneers of 1847, Hon. George Q. Cannon, formerly delegate in this House from the Territory of Utah, in his remarks before the National Irrigation Congress at Denver in September, 1894, that I can not forbear quoting them and preserving them in the records of this debate. He says:

Forty-seven years ago I crossed the plains in company with companions who were then seeking homes in the far West. I did not occupy so prominent a position in the community as has been represented, because I was but a youth 20 years old, but I was then, as I am now, deeply interested in the future of this Western country. I felt that there was a great future for it, and then to me, as with all those who traveled at that time, it was so different to all the old conditions under which we lived that it seemed like a new world. We entered Salt Lake Valley, that is, I and the party I accompanied, about eight weeks after the pioneers, headed by Brigham Young, had entered the valley. That band conisted of 143 men and 3 women. We followed them, and traveled with women and children in considerable number, there being some 2,000 all told in the different companies.

THE LUXURY OF POTATOES.

The pioneers had already planted a few seeds and made some attempt at irrigation, but as they landed the latter part of July (the 24th it was), it was very difficult to do anything except to preserve the seed. That seed was very carefully cared for and husbanded, and from that seed the seed potatoes (that was the first vegetable introduced into Utah) sprung. But it was not until 1849 that any of us, unless it was through curiosity, tasted potatoes. We preserved the seed so carefully that we did not dare to eat potatoes. In 1848, after planting our grains and vegetables, we found that to obtain the food we needed we could not depend upon rains, but would have to water the land from the streams, and as we did not have the scientific friends that we have with us now to do it in a scientific manner, we went at it as best we could, and took out water by the simplest means in our reach, and we were successful in raising at least a part of a crop. After our grain had been sown and our fields looked promising, black crickets came down by the millions and devoured our crops. I have seen fields of wheat look as promising as they could in the morning, and by evening they would be as bare as the palm of a man's hand—devoured by these crickets.

For a time it seemed that everything we had planted would be destroyed, and you can well imagine the precariousness of our position. California was on our west 800 miles distant; to the east was no settlement nearer than the Des Moines River in Iowa, and a few settlements perhaps in upper Missouri, so that we were entirely dependent upon that food which we had brought in our wagons. That supply was so limited that we had to deal it out with the utmost care. Food was weighed by the ounce and limited to every individual, and no one could eat more than his share of the allowance that was divided for the week's supply.

I was a growing boy, and I had never worked so hard as we had to do then. My allowance of food, therefore, was not sufficient for my wants and I was continually hungry during that winter. It seemed to me that I was hungry to the ends of toes and fingers.

THISTLE TOPS AS FOOD.

When spring came the thistles began to grow in the neighborhood of our fields. Our oxen were thin, and we could only use them in plowing until about the middle of the afternoon. Then we would go around and gather thistle tops for greens. It is a fact that the distention of the stomach caused by eating these thistles allayed our hunger, and having milk, which our cows began to give freely, we soon grew fat.

The crickets, to which I have alluded, destroyed a great many fields, and it seemed for a while that they would devour everything that was planted. I had no responsibility upon me, but I have often since thought of the wonderful courage which the men who had families depending upon them exhibited under these circumstances. I can recall no expressions of fear or discouragement. Every man appeared to feel that he would stay there, no matter what the consequences might be. But relief came to us, and to us who lived in Utah at that time it appeared like a direct interposition of Providence to save us.

Sea gulls came by hundreds and thousands, and before the crops were entirely destroyed these gulls devoured the insects so that our fields were entirely freed from them. Since then, whenever I see a boy pointing a gun at a gull I feel that I want to knock his gun up. The bird has become sacred to me. Since then Salt Lake has become the habitat of this bird. After these gulls came, I have gone along our water ditches in the morning and have seen quantities of small piles of crickets which the gulls had eaten and vomited up. By disgorging themselves in this way each bird must have devoured immense quantities.

The dryness of the country at that time was something dreadful. It seemed as though the land was dead. This was forcibly brought to my mind by seeing a grave dug soon after we reached the valley. The spot is now one of the most populous parts of Salt Lake City, and is very fertile, but at that time it seemed as though the ground had not been saturated for ages. One of the first ditches that was dug was taken out of the creek near where the large cooperative store now stands, which some of you ladies and gentlemen who have visited Salt Lake may remember. This ditch was dug to convey the water to the fort, in which the people then lived, which was about half a mile distant, and the ground was so thirsty that it took two days for it to run that distance.

THE UTAH OF TO-DAY.

Great and happy results have followed the system of irrigation. I can say to-day that Utah is proud to have the opportunity of participating in a congress of this character. We feel that the questions to be brought before this congress are of the greatest importance, not only to this portion of America but to the entire Union. Every man in this entire Republic ought to be interested in the questions which will be discussed, I hope, so freely and profitably in our congress. It is a matter which affects not only the West, but the East, and in fact it may be said to affect humanity, and everything should be done in our deliberations to reach united action, so that whatever we determine upon will be acceptable to the whole people and to the Congress of the United States.

I am glad that these deliberations are likely to take a wide scope. I would like to see every person take an interest in irrigation, whether he lives in the arid regions or the heaven-watered regions, and I hope every delegate will have the opportunity to express himself with the utmost freedom, that we may reach not only unity of sentiment, but unity of action.

We in Utah have proved that the small holdings are the best for the people. Our pioneers when they went into that country arranged in the first place that men at the head of a household should receive a city lot. The city was divided into blocks of 10 acres, containing 8 lots of 1¼ acres each. I remember applying for a lot, and was told that I was not a married man and could not have the land. Outside the city the first lots were 5-acre lots, later 10-acre lots, and later 20-acre lots. Mechanics were each expected to draw at least 5 acres, and if their families were large enough they could draw 10 acres. It was not a law, but a regulation. These regulations were adopted so that no man should monopolize land. Every man in the community could have a sufficient quantity to enable him to raise what he wanted, but could have no land for speculation.

The people of Utah have been in dread of a tax for water. They do not think it is necessary. We have proved that water can be taken out and be used by the poor man without being taxed for it when the people are united and make a proper combination of effort. We have proved this, and also that large tracts of land are not necessary for the public good.

What has been done in the valleys of Utah may be done elsewhere, and the question is presented to the broad-minded men of this country whether the great sage-brush plains of the arid region shall be permitted to remain waste and unproductive, whether the great rivers and flood waters shall continue to flow idly to the sea, or whether we shall unite them and make homes for the people. That the consummation which we seek is one devoutly to be wished no one will deny.

OBJECTIONS ANSWERED.

No one will for an instant contend that to add to the wealth-producing area of this country millions of acres of productive lands is an unwise thing to do. The contention arises over the proposition to have this work undertaken by the National Government.

As proposed by the bill under consideration, however, there should be on the part of any reasonable person no objection to this. This bill does not propose to take a single dollar from the Treasury. It does not impose a dollar of taxation upon a single citizen. It simply devotes these at present valueless and barren lands to their own redemption. I shall not take up the time of the House to enter upon a discussion of the details of the bill. I shall content myself with making a brief reply to some of the objections which have been urged against it. These objections in the main are to be found embodied in the minority report made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] and in his speech of yesterday.

NO CORRUPTION OR WASTE PROBABLE.

One objection urged is that it attempts to vest in the Secretary of the Interior large and dangerous powers and places in his hands for distribution immense sums of money, and it is feared that this will result in wholesale corruption, misapplication, and waste of money.

The millions of dollars which are appropriated every year by the Congress of the United States for the improvement of rivers and harbors, for public buildings, and for other purposes must of necessity be expended under the direction of officers of the United States. I will undertake to say that in the main they are expended with the utmost honesty, care, and discretion. Among the high officers of this Government—the President and his immediate advisers, the members of the Cabinet—no matter what party has been in power in the United States, we have had, thank God, none but patriotic and honest men. I am not afraid to trust any man who is worthy to be called to fill the high office of Secretary of the Interior to honestly expend this money. It may be true that there will be occasional unwise expenditures of money, just as it is true that there is every year unwise and needless expenditure of money under the appropriation for the improvement of rivers and harbors, but in the main the money will be spent wisely. In the aggregate and in the long run it will be spent in such a way as to bring about the best results. We should not permit ourselves to be diverted from doing a wise and great work like this by the fear that occasional mistakes will be made.

NOT A RAILROAD, BUT A HOME-MAKING SCHEME.

Another objection that is made is that this is a railroad scheme to enable the land-grant railroads to have their lands benefited by irrigation works, at public expense, and then sell them at enormous prices. Such a claim is absurd on its face. The bill expressly provides that the public lands which may be irrigated by the works to be constructed are subject to entry only under the homestead laws of the United States, in tracts not exceeding 160 acres. It also forbids any person to acquire a right to irrigate more than this quantity of land, and requires actual residence upon the land. The railroad lands are not held in vast bodies, but are in alternate sections, and it is not to be expected that settlers who may procure public lands free of charge will pay extravagant prices for railroad lands immediately adjoining them.

In any event this bill is essentially a home-building and home-making proposition. It effectually excludes everything in the nature of a land monopoly, and it is an exceedingly narrow criticism of such a measure that while doing a work so beneficial that we shall incidentally enable somebody to make some money. Such a view would sweep from our statute books every protective law which we have, because, while protection elevates and dignifies the masses of the people, it also enables great corporations to prosper as well.

POWER OF EMINENT DOMAIN CONSTITUTIONAL.

It is also objected that the bill confers upon the Secretary of the Interior the authority to condemn lands and water rights, and it is said that the General Government has not the constitutional power to exercise the right of eminent domain for such purposes, and that if it had, its exercise would result in taking from private owners water rights which they already have and depriving individual States of the opportunity to irrigate their own unproductive lands.

Now, it is first to be observed that the bill does not attempt to confer the right to condemn other water rights. Its language is that where—

> In carrying out the provisions of this act it becomes necessary to acquire any rights or property the Secretary is authorized to acquire the same by purchase or condemnation.

No lawyer would contend that under this bill the vested rights of an individual to water could be taken for the purpose of giving it to some other individual or individuals. The bill does not intend anything of the sort. The Secretary must proceed in the condemnation proceedings under the laws of the State.

No State recognizes the right of condemnation of the vested rights of an individual in water for the use of other individuals. The rights and property which are permitted to be condemned are rights of way for the construction of canals, and lands for the building of reservoirs. In other words, what is contemplated is the condemnation of the means by which the storage and distribution of surplus waters may be effected, and not the condemnation of an accrued water right. That this is true is so apparent from the mere reading of the bill that any extended discussion of it, in my judgment, would be a waste of time.

But it is said that the Federal Government has no power to exercise the right of eminent domain for such purposes. Elsewhere in the minority report it is contended that the Federal Government has no constitutional power to expend money for the purpose of reclaiming its lands at all, but it is admitted that if such power exists, then the power of eminent domain necessarily follows. I shall undertake to show a little later on that the general constitutional power does exist, which, according to the admission of the minority report, will demonstrate the existence as a necessary corollary of the right to condemn.

But the General Government may exercise this power by reason of its proprietorship of the lands. Being the proprietor and owner of a vast amount of land in the various States, it has the right under the laws of those States to do whatever any other proprietor might do. Every one of these arid-land States, by express statute and often by provision of its constitution, declares that the irrigation of lands is a public use, and that the right of eminent domain may be exercised therefor.

Take, as illustrative, my own State of Utah. In the first State legislature of 1896 a law was passed which I had the honor of introducing, which declares in so many words that the cultivation and irrigation of the soil is a pursuit in which all are interested, and from which all derive a benefit; and the irrigation of land is declared to be for the public use, and the right of eminent domain may be exercised in behalf thereof.

Under well-settled rules what may be a public use in one State may not be in another. The extent and importance of the industry is to be considered. It was held in Nevada in an early case, where the subject is treated with great learning, that the mining industry being the paramount industry of the State, upon which the body of the people directly and indirectly in great measure depended, the condemnation of lands for mining purposes was a public use. These statutes in the various arid-land States have been upheld as valid wherever they have come before the courts. Under them the right of eminent domain may be exercised by the citizen for the condemnation of rights of way for canals, ditches, and reservoirs. Indeed, in the absence of all statutes it may be very well argued that the right would exist.

The old doctrine of riparian rights, one of the fixed rules of the common law, has no application to the arid region. It has been abolished by express statute in many States, but it is held in other States to be as effectually abolished in the absence of statute. Such a rule can have no application to the arid region where the diversion of water from the streams, even to the last drop, is of imperious and overwhelming necessity, and so it was early held that the reason upon which the doctrine of riparian rights was founded having ceased, the rule itself ceased with it.

In view of this necessity for the diversion of water, it may be well insisted that the right to convey water across the lands of another exists in the absence of statute. As was well said by the supreme court of Colorado in the case of Schilling v. Rominger (4 Colo., 100):

> Primarily, where the climatic conditions are such as exist in Colorado, the right to convey water for irrigating purposes over land owned by another is founded upon the imperious laws of nature, with reference to which it must be presumed the Government parts with its title. And although a patent may be silent in regard to conditions which, if expressly named, could have no greater force, it can not be asserted that therefore they do not exist. Subject to regulation by statute and resting upon the law of nature, it is conceived that the right to convey water over another's land is inseparable from the enjoyment of the land which the United States conveys to its grantees. This right passes with the land as a necessary incident.

But even if it were true that the Federal Government has no authority to exercise the power of eminent domain, that affords no reason for voting against this bill. If the court should determine that that particular provision of the bill is inoperative and if it were necessary in some particular enterprise to make use of private property, and the Government could not acquire the title by purchase, then it would simply result in the failure of that enterprise. Everybody knows that substantially all the unappropriated waters rise in the mountains upon public lands. The reservoirs which are to be constructed for the purpose of impounding the surplus waters will be constructed upon the public domain, so the main canals which it may be necessary to construct will almost always be on the public domain. It will rarely become necessary to make use of private property in connection with these works.

I have, speaking for myself, no doubt whatever as to the validity of this provision in the bill, but if it should turn out that this view is a mistaken one, the effect upon the general scheme is of so little consequence that it is scarcely worthy of consideration.

DOES NOT AFFECT VESTED RIGHTS.

It is further objected that the power of the Secretary is not limited to the retention of surplus waters. I have already undertaken to show that it is. When a citizen has made an appropriation of water for a beneficial use, it becomes his property as fully and completely as the land which he holds by patent from the United States. This bill does not attempt to confer upon the Secretary of the Interior the power to deprive him of his vested rights. It would be absolutely void and worthless if it did.

NO CONFLICT BETWEEN NATIONAL AND LOCAL CONTROL.

But it is said that the bill contains conflicting provisions; that it contemplates a divided control; that as soon as a major portion of the lands to be irrigated under any particular enterprise has been paid for, the control, the management, and operation of the irrigation works shall pass to the owners of the lands, but that the title to and the management and operation of the reservoirs and works necessary for their protection shall remain in the Government. The two provisions are absolutely distinct and are absolutely consistent.

The title and control of the reservoirs themselves and the works incident to their maintenance, namely, the dam and headgates, remain in the General Government precisely the same as the ownership of a navigable lake or a river remains in the public, but the canals and the lateral ditches by which the water is diverted and applied to the land are under the control, ownership, and management of the users of the water just as the canals and ditches taken from a public lake or public river would be under their control, and no more confusion can result in the one case than has actually resulted in the other.

But it is said, further, that the laws of the State or Territory relating to the control, appropriation, and use of the water are not to be interfered with, and this will result in still further confusion. The confusion is in the mind of the objector and not in the bill. No more confusion will result from the use of these waters under the local laws and regulations of the State than have resulted by the use of other waters or property.

The fact that the title to a lake is in the public, the title and ownership and control of the canals leading from it is in the proprietors of the water, and that the appropriation and use of the water is under the State law has never resulted in any sort of confusion. On the contrary, if the appropriation and use were not under the provisions of the State law the utmost confusion would prevail. The full domination and complete ownership of a tract of land is in no manner injuriously affected, because its title must be acquired and disposed of and it must be occupied and held under and in accordance with the law of the State.

COMPETITION WITH EASTERN FARMERS.

The most unworthy objection that is urged to this bill is that it will bring more lands under cultivation in the West which will come into competition with the farmers of the East. It is the old appeal to selfishness in a new form. It is the old song of the mossback set to new music. It is the same old narrow cry based upon the same old narrow reasons that made the illiterate freighter of the "forties" object to the railroad and the locomotive for fear of the competition with his mules and horses, and that caused the sailmaker to look upon Robert Fulton as a public enemy. The objection, in the exact language of the minority report, is as follows:

If we add millions of acres of productive land to our national possessions we shall surely diminish the value of the present farming lands throughout the Union, and we shall open new areas in the Far West to compete in production with the farmers in the South, East, and Middle West. The people in these sections will not consent, and ought not to consent, to pay from the public Treasury for the construction of such public works, which, even if successful, will work injury to their interests.

Such an objection is particularly unworthy upon the lips of a Republican who has been taught that the unceasing development of all our resources is the very gospel of his party. No man need fear the effect of developing the natural resources of this country.

I commend to the minority of the Irrigation Committee that famous quotation from English literature, the words of Dean Swift:

And he gave as his opinion that whoever could make two ears of corn or two blades of grass to grow upon a spot of ground where only one grew before would deserve better of mankind and do more essential service to his country than the whole race of politicians put together.

If he who makes two blades of grass to grow where there was only one before is better than a politician, surely the nation which causes two fruitful farms to flourish in the desert where before there was only one is entitled to our highest praise. There is an old and homely proverb of the poor, based upon the simple faith of humble folk, that God never sends mouths into this world without food to fill them. My own observation is that the converse of that proposition is more nearly accurate—that God never sends food into this world without mouths to consume it. So long as children in the great tenement districts of our great cities continue to go in tears to supperless beds; so long as the gaunt figure of famine continues to affright the millions of India and Russia, there is no fear of any excessive production of food stuffs in this country. Reduced to its last analysis, it is not only a selfish but a shameless argument.

But aside from the selfishness and narrowness of the argument there is absolutely nothing in it. When the facts are understood it will be seen that the lands can not be brought under cultivation so rapidly or in such bodies as to constitute the slightest menace to the Eastern farmer.

The arid West has an area greater in extent than that of the original thirteen States, but its physical characteristics are such that under the most favorable conditions not a tithe of the lands can ever be brought under cultivation. My own judgment is that it is an extravagant estimate to say that more than 60,000,000 acres can ever be supplied with water, and this can be done only in the course of more than half a century.

It is estimated that the income from the sale of public lands will be about $2,000,000 per annum. The labor of constructing these storage reservoirs and the works incident thereto is necessarily one which will occupy many years. The sites are to be surveyed, selected, designated, plans are to be drawn, and after that the works themselves constructed. With a comparatively small amount in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior at any one time, there can, of course, not be many of these enterprises under construction at the same time. After the works are constructed, the lands themselves are to be taken up and to be prepared for tillage. All this consumes time, and much time.

It is perfectly safe to say that, under the most favorable conditions imaginable, after the work shall be begun these lands can not be brought under cultivation in a greater quantity than one-half a million acres per annum. There is no menace in this to the farmers of the East. This quantity of land will only partially take the place of the vastly larger quantity that has been added to the cultivatable area by the location upon lands in the humid region and upon available lands in the arid region in the past.

The settlement of this class of lands is now almost at an end. The lands to be taken up under the provisions of this bill will not begin to equal in quantity that which has been taken up heretofore under the public land laws. The farming in the arid region is necessarily of an intensive character. It does not pay the agriculturist of Utah to own vast areas of lands which he is compelled to irrigate foot by foot. He must of necessity cultivate small farms and make the very most possible out of his crops. He therefore cultivates the sugar beet and other crops which can be utilized in his immediate vicinity.

He is at a great distance from the general market and can not compete with the Eastern farmer, first, on account of the freights, and, second, because he can not raise his crop so cheaply. One of the great crops of the arid region is to-day and will continue to be alfalfa, which supplements the range grasses for cattle feed. This is a crop which does not in the slightest degree come into competition with the Eastern farmer.

I do not think even the farmers of the East object to an increase in our beef cattle. Certainly the market for this product which we have to-day would be better for a considerable addition. The more cattle we raise in the West the less trouble you will have with the beef trust in the East.

THE BILL IS CONSTITUTIONAL.

Another objection which is urged to the bill is that it is unconstitutional. This objection is strenuously insisted upon by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. If such an objection came from the mouth of a less able man it would not be worthy of a moment's notice. When other reasons fail—when other arguments are seen to be weak—the Constitution is appealed to. It is the dernier ressort of the legislator who thinks he is opposed to a measure, but who does not exactly know why. The objector paraphrases the rule laid down by Hoyle, "When in doubt, play the Constitution."

The minority report insists that under the Constitution Congress is given the power to dispose of and to make all needful rules and regulations for the territory and other property of the United States. It is said that this is the limit of our power. We may dispose of the lands, but we may not improve them. Our friends have gone back to the days of Jefferson and Calhoun for their political arguments. Jackson himself never insisted upon a more narrow construction of the Constitution. We of this day and generation have been taught that it is not necessary that the Constitution should confer in express and precise terms the authority for doing a particular act. We understand that there are implied powers in the Constitution. A general grant of authority having been made, the means by which it is to be carried out are left to the judgment of Congress.

CONSTITUTION TO BE BROADLY CONSTRUED.

The Constitution was not made for the farmers, the fishermen, and the hunters of the thirteen original States alone. It was never intended to chain the hands of future generations of millions of restless workers in the manifold pursuits of forty-five, soon to be forty-eight, sovereign States by the strict and literal interpretation of its general language. The fathers gave us the Constitution written in broad and comprehensive terms. They pointed out to us the ultimate results which we were permitted to accomplish, but they left to the future Congresses the power to determine by what means these results should be brought about.

So long as those means are not prohibited by the express language of the Constitution and are, in the judgment of Congress, reasonably adapted to the accomplishment of the results which are permitted, they are constitutional, and are so recognized by all sound constitutional lawyers. In other words, the Constitution declares what we may do, but not how we shall do it. The framers of that instrument drew upon the canvas certain broad, general lines, leaving it to the lawmakers of the future to fill in the details of the picture. The Constitution gives Congress the authority to regulate foreign and interstate commerce. This is the ultimate thing which we are permitted to do. How we shall do it, when we shall do it, is left to the wisdom of Congress.

We appropriate vast sums of money for the improvement of the Mississippi River; we build great locks in the Sault Ste. Marie; we dredge the harbors at New York and Boston, all under this general grant of power to regulate commerce. We go further than this. We have improved rivers and streams where it is the merest pretense to say that any useful purpose of navigation was subserved. It simply furnished water for the operation of flour mills somewhere or protected lands from overflow. Under the general grant of power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations for the territory and other property of the United States, in my judgment we have the authority to put these lands in a condition to be disposed of.

In the public lands of the United States, as it has been many times decided, the Federal Government is both a sovereign and a proprietor. In its sovereign capacity it may protect the lands and punish trespassers by imprisonment. As a proprietor it may sell, withhold from sale, or give away the lands. It is the owner and proprietor of these lands, but being also a sovereign, it is its duty as proprietor to deal with them in the highest and best way for the benefit of the people. If the lands are barren, unproductive, useless, so that they can not be made of benefit to the people, can not be disposed of without improvement but may be made valuable and a vast benefit to the entire people by improvement, is it possible that this sovereign power by the strict letter of the Constitution is bound to condemn this vast domain to perpetual aridity?

UNDER STRICT CONSTRUCTION BILL IS CONSTITUTIONAL.

But, in my judgment, it is not necessary to antagonize the position that our authority is limited strictly to a disposition of these lands. What we propose by this bill is to dispose of the lands. It will not be disputed—it has been repeatedly determined, not only by the courts but by the uniform practice of the legislative department—that the power of Congress to dispose of the public lands is plenary. We may give them away upon certain conditions to individuals, as in the homestead laws.

We may give them to private corporations under certain conditions, as in the Pacific railroad grants. We may cede them to the States with or without conditions, as in the various enabling acts by which the territories were admitted into the Union. We have a right to grant the public lands within any State directly to the State, upon condition that the proceeds shall be used for the maintenance of common schools. We have done so repeatedly. We have the power to grant every foot of the public lands in these thirteen arid States to those States respectively, upon condition that the proceeds arising from their sale shall be devoted to the building and maintenance of irrigation works. Thus far there can be no question. No one will dispute it.

If we can thus dispose of the lands directly for irrigation purposes, upon what theory can it be contended that we may not first convert the lands into money and dispose of the money directly arising from their sale for the same purpose? But to insist that we may dispose of a thing directly but may not convert that thing into something else and then dispose of that something else is the cheapest and most idle sort of quibbling. If I empower my friend to dispose of a horse—to sell, to give away, to hire it—in short, to do with it what he likes, and he chooses first, to convert the horse into money and then dispose of the money, is he not strictly within my grant of power?

The plain statement of some propositions are their own best refutation, and this, in my judgment, is one of them, and I shall not discuss it further.

NEW ENGLAND OBJECTIONS.

Mr. Chairman, the objections which are urged to the passage of this bill in the House are duplicated outside. A few years ago in that center of culture and refinement and correct pronunciation, but of occasional general misinformation, the city of Boston, some learned professor insisted that if the irrigated area of the West received any considerable addition it would result in increasing the severity of the winters in New England. His idea seemed to be that the result upon the climate would be about equivalent to moving New England up to Labrador.

Last summer, when this subject was again being discussed by the country, another gentleman, probably also a professor, took the position that the intense heat which prevailed throughout the New England States was occasioned by the irrigation in the arid region. He demonstrated it by learned and labored arguments.

We are therefore blamed for the extreme of winter cold and summer heat as well. We are the modern giant killer, who warms his fingers and cools his porridge with the same breath. We bring about exactly contrary results by the same means.

These are samples, though they may not be very fair samples, of the reasons that have been urged against the further extension of the irrigated area.

THE BILL IN HARMONY WITH REPUBLICAN PRINCIPLES.

Mr. Chairman, I can not believe that any considerable opposition will be made to this bill upon the Republican side of this Chamber. The party which gave us the homestead law, under which millions of comfortable homes have been established upon the public domain, will not halt when the opportunity is presented of duplicating that splendid achievement. Some gentlemen say that sometime we should pass some such law as this, but that we should not pass it now. I beg them to remember that "he gives twice who gives quickly." The work which is to be done under this bill is not the work of a year or of ten years, but of half a century. If it is to be done sometime, it should be begun now.

The Republican party has presented to it by this bill an opportunity which comes to it at rare intervals—to lay the foundation for another monument to its genius and foresight. Surely it has not lost the ability to look into the future and see how splendid a monument it will be. The millions of people who shall inhabit that region in years to come will not fail to remember with gratitude the party whose generous action made it possible for them to do so.

We have written in our platform a distinct pledge to pass legislation of this character, and the Republican party has always gone with the unerring flight of a rifle bullet from promise to performance. Year after year and decade after decade it has gone steadily on with scarcely an interruption from achievement to achievement. It has written across the South, "Restored and reunited." It has made the Atlantic seacoast musical with the hum of machinery. It has filled Pennsylvania, Ohio, and West Virginia with the smoke and flame of industry and the rumble of rolling cars. It has spread upon the Great Lakes of the North a commerce mightier than that which plows the seas. It has given the Middle West a home market for its products, the greatest and the surest and the richest the world has ever seen. Only the great Arid West remains to be cared for.

For more than half a century she has stood there among her lofty peaks and her vast solitudes slowly, painfully, but patiently working out her own destiny, pouring into the lap of the East the mighty stream of her gold and silver to fructify and keep alive the fields of commerce and labor and industry. It is, after all, a little thing which she is asking now. Only that she may be permitted to use her own resources for her own redemption.

I appeal to you, my colleagues of the majority, to give it to her, not grudgingly, not reluctantly, not with doubt and suspicion, but with open hand, generously and unreservedly, as becomes a a great party, and let us write across the face of the desert, "Increase and multiply." [Applause.]

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado moves that debate on the pending section and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that by making it thirty seconds.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to amend by making it thirty seconds. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Colorado as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the motion agreed to.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration provides that the proceeds arising from the sale of public lands in the arid-land States and Territories shall be used by the Secretary of the Interior as a fund for the purpose of constructing reservoirs and irrigation works for the reclamation of the public arid lands.

It further provides that after the construction of such irrigation works the cost thereof shall be divided among the acres to be irrigated, and before title can be obtained for the land from the Government the proportionate cost must be paid in ten annual installments.

It further provides that the homestead laws shall be applicable to all of the lands to be irrigated, provided the settler pays the proportionate cost of construction of the irrigation works.

The reclamation of the arid lands of the West has been agitated for many years, and has at last culminated in the provisions of the pending bill. I wish to discuss the question involved therein, first, as to the necessity for action of this character; second, as to why the National Government should act; and, third, the result of such action.

I. NECESSITY FOR ACTION.

The homestead laws of the United States were framed to apply to those lands which receive sufficient precipitation of water to raise ordinary crops. They did not contemplate settlement upon arid lands, although they could be and were made applicable to arid lands in the early history of the West. The homesteader could then locate upon 160 acres lying contiguous to a stream and by constructing an irrigating ditch from the stream a short distance above conduct water for irrigation to his land, but all such lands have now been settled, and the only lands open to the homesteader are far removed from the streams and so situated that it would take many miles of ditching to tap the streams sufficiently high to bring water to the lands. The cost of getting water to such lands is more than a hundred times the value of the land, and hence beyond the possibility of the ordinary settler.

The natural flow of water in the streams in the arid West has already been appropriated, and hence there is left only the storm and winter waters, which can be stored in reservoirs and when needed in summer used for irrigation purposes. Inasmuch as the flood and winter waters, which now go to waste, constitute about four-fifths of the entire flow in the streams, it can readily be seen that their storage and utilization could reclaim about four times the area which is now under irrigation in the arid region. As nothing but disaster can come to the man who locates a homestead upon the arid lands beyond the limits of irrigation, and as the cost of bringing water to such lands is far beyond his or the combined means of settlers without capital, it can readily be seen that the limit of development in agriculture has about been reached in the arid region unless some such measure as this is enacted into law.

The necessity for such action is apparent also from the fact that many Americans are now moving to British Columbia for the purpose of taking advantage of the cheap public lands of that province open to settlement. It has been estimated by a reliable Denver paper that 50,000 Americans have gone to Canada this year for the purpose of availing themselves of the benefit of the cheap public lands there located.

The necessity for some action of this character is so universally conceded that the great political parties in national convention assembled have declared in favor of the reclamation of the arid lands by the National Government.

Unless we wish no development in the arid region of the West, unless we are willing that the people of the United States should seek other lands, unless we are willing that our people should develop foreign countries, unless we are willing that our natural greatness shall be dwarfed, we must enact some measure of this character for the development of that vast territory lying west of the one hundredth meridian, which constitutes nearly one-half of the area of the Union.

II. WHY THE GOVERNMENT SHOULD ACT.

Since the natural flow of the streams in the arid region has already been appropriated, it is impossible for a settler to reclaim Government land. The cost of constructing a reservoir and conducting the water stored therein to his land would be so enormous compared to the value of his settlement that it becomes an impossible task. As settlers are always poor, a combination of them would be equally unavailing.

The reason private corporations have not made a success of irrigation enterprises is because they have never been able to control both the water and the land. The Government land not being open to location by a corporation, such companies have not been able to acquire land and thus receive the benefit which follows from the application of water to land. As the Government has the title to the land, and desires that it should be occupied by the actual settlers, almost the only way success can be attained is by the Government constructing the reservoirs and disposing of the land and water to the settlers.

The National Government owes a duty to the State which does not seem to be appreciated by many of the members of this House. The United States has never acquired territory for the purpose of holding perpetual title thereto, except those small tracts of land used for governmental purposes. The object of the United States in the purchase of territory has always been the acquisition of political sovereignty and the incidental benefits which arise in the increase of wealth and population, which in the end yield enormous sums in taxation.

Inasmuch as it is the law that all property of the United States shall be exempt from State and county taxation, it can readily be seen that a great wrong is perpetrated against the State if the Government holds in perpetuity lands within the limits of the State, and a great wrong is perpetrated if the settlement laws are so framed that they are not applicable to the arid region and therefore produce no settlement of such public lands.

It is recognized that generally thirty years' exemption from taxation equals the value of the land. It can therefore be seen that in the fifty-five years' exemption from taxation of Government lands in the West the States have suffered a loss of nearly double the value of the lands.

The State and county governments of that region are compelled to levy taxes on the lands in private ownership far in excess of what would be required if the Government's lands were liable to taxation.

It is not right to the State and county governments of that region that they should maintain government over all of those lands, patrol the same, establish roads and bridges over the same, and yet receive no return from the proprietor of three-fourths of the lands. Ninety-six per cent of the real estate of the State of Nevada is public lands. You can readily see that as 4 per cent of the lands must bear all the burdens of State, county, and school government, while 96 per cent of the lands are free from taxation, the law produces a great injustice to the State of Nevada. The same injustice in a less degree is perpetrated against every other State in the West.

On account of this condition, it is plain that the United States Government owes a duty to the States, not to hold in perpetuity its lands, not to refuse to make settlement laws that are applicable to that region, but to proceed to put its lands in such condition that as much of the public domain as possible may be irrigated and become producing farms, so that the States may get some return in taxation for the State and county governments extending over the same.

The National Government also owes a duty to its own people to give them the opportunity of building homes. There is no factor that enters so much into the creation of good citizenship as the home. Its influence for good is far-reaching in its consequences. To convert its absolutely worthless land into fertile farms, by which millions of its citizens can live in comfort, is the highest duty of the Government of the United States.

It is not fair that the West should be compelled to contribute for the enormous river and harbor improvements, for the building of great fortifications on the seaboard, and for the construction of the costly battle ships and cruisers of the nation, without receiving in some way appropriations that will assist its development.

The river and harbor improvements are worth nothing to the West. The fortifications, battle ships, and cruisers are not for our protection. The combined armies of the world, even if they could effect a lodgment on our coast, could never penetrate into the interior of our country. But we do not begrudge the expenditures for the proper protection of our seacoast cities, nor for the development of our ocean and river commerce. But you should recognize that when you get so much in the way of appropriations for the East you should be willing to give us something for the development of our own States, which will result in far greater benefit to the nation at large than ten times the amount expended in the improvements of rivers and harbors. For these reasons, it seems to me, the Government should act.

III. RESULT OF ACTION.

West of the one hundredth meridian there are 600,000,000 acres of public arid lands. These lands are practically worthless unless they can be reclaimed for agricultural purposes. When reclaimed they become the richest and most productive lands in the world. The converting of lands that are worthless into farms that produce more bountifully than any wilds known is bound to result in the building up of great States with great population and with enormous wealth.

It is estimated by the Geological Survey that 60,000,000 of acres of this arid and worthless land can be reclaimed by the construction of reservoirs, as contemplated in this bill. The converting of 60,000,000 acres of worthless land into that number of acres of the most fertile land in the world, with its increase in productive power from nothing to rich yield, is sure to produce a marvelous development in that region. It has been estimated by the Geological Survey that the lands so reclaimed are capable of supporting a population of 50,000,000 of people.

Fifty millions of Americans, contented and happy, upon lands yielding bountiful crops, will be a marvelous result when you consider that the lands are now the home of the prairie dog and coyote. What a market for the Eastern manufacturer will these 50,000,000 people make, with their enormous consuming power. Such a trade will be worth more to the manufacturers of the East than the entire trade of the Orient with all the world.

How shortsighted it is to attempt to acquire and develop territories occupied by alien races, with very little consuming ability, when we have such a promising field within the borders of our own country.

WHAT COMPETITION WILL BE CREATED.

It has been contended by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] that the products from the lands reclaimed will come in competition with those of the farmers of the Middle West, and therefore the bill should not pass. Where would Iowa be to-day if the Government had not pursued a liberal policy with relation to the settlement of the lands of that and other Western States? It has given to the people of those States the opportunity to take up lands for nothing, or at nominal figures, which required no expenditure to speak of to develop into productive farms.

Was it not a wise policy upon the part of the National Government to so frame its land laws as to develop the State of Iowa? Would not people of the East have been justified by fear of competition to have retarded settlement in Iowa by illiberal land laws if they are justified now by apprehension that competition will arise between the farmers of the arid region and those of the East? The Government can not afford to dwarf any portion of her domain.

But, sir, on account of the high freight rates existing between the arid region and the Eastern market, it is to the interest of that section to principally raise crops that will not compete with the farmers of the Middle West.

The great crop of that region is alfalfa hay, which is too bulky to be shipped, which is fed on the farm to cattle, which in turn are shipped to the cornfields of Kansas and Nebraska for fattening before being further shipped to the packing houses for beef. Over one-half of the value of the agricultural crops of Colorado is from the production of alfalfa. Of the $16,970,588 of agricultural products raised in Colorado, the sum of $8,159,279 was from alfalfa.

The tendency in the arid West is to raise those commodities which can be consumed at home or which do not come in competition with products of the East, because it is to the interest of the farmers there so to do. The people of my State are now increasing enormously the production of sugar beets, which are manufactured into sugar in the localities where they are raised, the sugar being sufficiently valuable to warrant the payment of freight rates to the East. In other portions of the arid region oranges, lemons, olives, and grapes are raised, and although they are shipped East they do not compete with the products of the Eastern farmers.

The three great staple products of the United States are corn, cotton, and wheat. Very little corn can be grown in the arid West, because of the cool nights that prevail there, caused by the altitude of that region. Not only warm days, but warm nights are essential to the development of corn, and it is impossible to produce corn to any extent without these conditions.

No cotton whatever is raised in that Western country for the same reason. It takes heat to produce cotton, and it is not there in sufficient degree.

We raise in the arid region some wheat, most of which is consumed at home, but some of which is shipped to the East. What is the extent of the competition which that wheat makes? Everyone recognizes as to a commodity which we export from our shores that the price of that which is exported fixes the price of all which is consumed in our country. The price of the exported commodity can not be less than the home price, because if less there would be a loss on every shipment. Under such conditions there is always a world's market that determines the price of such a product, and the world's price is fixed with relation to the demand for and supply of that product in the entire world.

It is recognized that the world's market for wheat and cotton is in Liverpool, England. In any part of the United States one can ascertain the price of wheat or cotton by deducting from the Liverpool price the charges of transportation to that market.

It can readily be seen, therefore, that what competition may be created by the raising of wheat by irrigation under the development produced by this bill will not be in the proportion which the amount raised in the arid region bears to the amount produced in the other States of the Union, but will be in the proportion which the amount raised in the arid region compares to the total amount produced in the entire world, and hence the competition created by growing a world's product must be infinitesimal. There is no more competition against the Eastern or Middle West farmers in the raising of wheat in the arid region than there is in the production of wheat in Canada. Both have to seek the Liverpool market for the price, and in the fixing of that world's price it is immaterial whether the wheat comes from the arid region, from Canada, from Argentina, or from India.

How foolish it would be for this country, in fear of competition among ourselves, to retard the development of the arid region of our own country while the development of Canada and other countries is progressing with rapid speed, and when the competition caused by the foreign wheat would be just as great as the competition produced by the raising of wheat in the arid region.

Although the result in the development of the West from the provisions of this bill will in the far future be great, yet it is bound to be very slow. All public works of the Government are constructed slowly, and consequently the area reclaimed each year relative to the acreage in the humid climate of our country is bound to be infinitesimal.

It is for these reasons, Mr. Chairman, that I am in favor of the passage of this bill. There is an absolute necessity for action in the reclamation of these arid lands. The Government is the only agency through which this action should be taken.

The result of such action is bound to make the arid part of the United States in the future not only one of the richest, but one of the most populous portions of our glorious Union.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Chairman, the consideration of this measure marks an epoch in the legislative history of our country, among the most important, especially as to internal policies, in the whole history of the nation.

The President, in his last annual message to Congress, was entirely justified, in my opinion, when he stated: "The forest and water problems are perhaps the most vital internal questions of the United States." We have had much to do and to say, during the last few years, relative to our nation's policies abroad, and while I do not wish to in any way minimize the importance of these external policies, still I confess to a feeling of gratitude that we are now considering a question which means so much to the internal growth and development of our country.

For years Western members of Congress have been working in season and out of season to bring to the consideration of both branches of Congress the question of irrigation in its national aspects. These efforts were looked upon by a great many people as futile, and ofttimes with ridicule, and by but few with much hope of ultimate success. However, when the two great political parties in their national platforms of 1900 adopted planks favorable to the national irrigation movement, the first great step was taken. The Republican platform adopted at Philadelphia upon this subject reads:

> In further pursuance of the constant policy of the Republican party to provide free homes on the public domain, we recommend adequate national legislation to reclaim the arid lands of the United States, reserving control of the distribution of water for irrigation to the respective States and Territories.

The Democratic platform reads:

> We favor an intelligent system of improving the arid lands of the West, storing the waters for purposes of irrigation, and the holding of such lands for actual settlers.

These declarations, made by the two great political parties of the country in their last national conventions, should not be, Mr. Chairman, by members upon either side of this Chamber lightly considered. These declarations were deliberately made. They were made as the result of a movement which had been going on for a number of years and which had increased in power until it had compelled national recognition. I can not but assume that the members of both political parties occupying seats upon this floor will give to the declarations of their party conscientious consideration with a view to meeting its demands and promises.

The second great step in this movement—and I speak now particularly of the movement looking toward legislative recognition—was when the President, in his last annual message, treated so fully and ably of this great question. I wish to commend the language of the President to the most careful consideration of every individual who may have any doubts whatever upon the policy of the United States entering upon this subject. I do not believe that there was ever crowded into so short a space an argument so cogent and reasons so forcible for the enactment of the legislation under consideration as are contained in the message of the President, and I will append as a part of my remarks that portion of the message referred to.

Mr. Chairman, the two principal arguments urged against the present bill are, first, that the bill itself is unconstitutional, and, second, that it will so increase the arable area of the United States as to disastrously affect the farmers of the East. There are other arguments urged against this legislation, but the two just named are those particularly relied upon by its opponents to bring about its defeat.

As to the first argument—that is, that it is unconstitutional—it is appropriate to say that this argument has been brought forth against every measure that was ever proposed that contemplated a departure in legislation from fixed policies theretofore followed. The argument that a specific measure is unconstitutional is one of the most familiar heard upon this floor. It is invoked by those who are opposed to legislation probably the most frequent of all arguments. It is a scarecrow set up before timid minds to deter action and to postpone consideration.

The claim that a specific measure or that the inauguration of a proposed policy is unconstitutional is one of the stock arguments of technical minds and hairsplitting constitutional lawyers. One thing is sure, and that is that there is at least doubt upon this subject. The policy itself is wise, is beneficial, is necessary; and conceding, for the sake of argument, that there is doubt of its constitutionality, what objections can the opponents of this measure raise to its enactment into law? If it is unconstitutional, it will be so declared. But we do not for a moment admit that the measure is unconstitutional. From the foundation of the Government Congress has enacted legislation for which there can be found no express warrant in the Constitution. As has already been said in this debate, if the interpretations of the strict constructionists are to be followed, we would have no power to organize and maintain an Agricultural Department, no power to maintain experimental stations or farms, no power or warrant in the Constitution to measure streams, none to investigate the various forms of plant and animal life. If we are to accept the ideas of those who take the narrow constitutional view, Congress has no power to establish a Geological Survey, no authority to improve rivers and harbors, no warrant for the examination and classification of our public lands, and yet Congress has been doing all these things for years.

Congress has power to dispose of and to make rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States, and it has power to promote the general welfare. If by the inauguration of a system of legislation we can better dispose of the territory of the United States—its public lands—we are warranted in believing that we are within our constitutional powers. But, Mr. Chairman, if the making arable of 70,000,000 acres of the public lands now worthless, uninhabited, and practically barren of both animal and plant life is not a promotion of the general welfare, then I am at a loss to understand what the National Legislature can undertake to do that would to a greater extent carry out this express warrant of the Constitution. The reclamation of this 70,000,000 acres of the public domain is not confined in its effect to this area alone, but it adds immensely to the wealth and producing capacity of the area immediately adjoining. That is to say, the result of this policy will bring into greater use the whole arid region.

The 70,000,000 acres which it is estimated can be brought under irrigation will be used in intensified farming, and being used in connection with the balance of the public domain not capable of actual reclamation will immeasurably promote the wealth and population of the whole arid and semiarid region of the United States, a section of our country which, exclusive of Alaska, occupies one-third of the territory of the country. If the settling up of one-third of the area of the United States; if the making of homes out of territory of the United States now practically uninhabited; if the division of this vast territory into small farms upon which will be American citizens contributing their share of the taxes to the States and to the country; if the inauguration of a policy which will bring about these results is not a promotion of the general welfare, then I am at a loss to understand what action could be taken by this body that would in a greater degree carry out this express warrant of the National Constitution.

Now, as to the second principal argument against the enactment of this legislation—that is, that its adoption will increase the arable area of the United States to such an extent as to injuriously affect the farmers of the East. It is difficult for me, Mr. Chairman, to have any patience with those who bring forth this argument. It is unworthy this great legislative body. I can not understand how any intelligent legislator will seriously urge it. An analysis of this contention will show its absurdity. If the bringing of further land within our national domain into competition with the Eastern farmers would have seriously affected them, then the acquisition of the Northwest Territory, every acre of which is in a humid climate, fertile and immensely productive, was a blunder; and the purchase of the Louisiana territory, bringing as it did the whole Mississippi Valley under our dominion, an empire afterwards erected into prosperous and fertile States, was a still greater mistake. The addition of these immense tracts to our national territory opened up profitable markets for the people of the East, tended immeasurably to diversify our industries, giving to the East an immense impetus to the growth of manufacturing industries, the West being given over particularly to agricultural pursuits, thus creating an interchange of commodities between the two sections mutually advantageous and profitable.

In the light of history, will anyone contend that the bringing under the flag of the Northwest Territory and the Louisiana purchase was in any way inimical to the interests of the Eastern section of our country? The mere statement of this argument, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, shows its absurdity. If it had any foundation whatever it would be equally as sensible for us to contend that our country would be better off to-day—more prosperous—if it were still composed of the thirteen original colonies.

The farming lands of the Northwest Territory and of the Louisiana purchase are somewhat similar to the farming lands of the East. The products of the soil of these three sections are to a more or less extent similar. Therefore, as a matter of fact, these sections necessarily compete with each other. But, Mr. Chairman, the land which will be brought under cultivation in the arid and semiarid region, if the bill under consideration passes, is very dissimilar to that of our Eastern farms.

The products of land raised by irrigation are necessarily of a different class and character from the products raised from land without irrigation. Therefore, the land which will be brought under cultivation by this measure will be much less in competition with the farms of the East than any lands that have heretofore been added to our farming domain. Products of the West raised by means of irrigation are largely fruits, vegetables, and alfalfa. Alfalfa is used, of course, exclusively for feed for stock, especially cattle. There is confessedly not a sufficient supply of beef cattle to meet the legitimate demands of our country. The same is true of fruit and vegetables; so that upon the face of matters it is seen that of the principal products which will come from the irrigated lands of the West the supply is unequal to the demand. Therefore, the slightest analysis of the question conclusively shows that the fear of the Eastern farmers that the opening up of lands in the West to farming by means of irrigation will bring them into injurious competition with them is utterly unfounded, and I suggest in all candor that their representatives upon this floor should resort to some argument more worthy of consideration.

Then, again, Mr. Chairman, so far as the staple products are concerned that are raised in the West, especially on the Pacific coast, they have never come into competition with similar products raised in our country east of that section. For years California, until irrigation became more general, was one of the leading wheat-producing States of the Union. Yet our wheat never came into competition with the Eastern wheat farmer, because the wheat raised on the Pacific coast has mostly thus far found a market in Europe. Liverpool has always been the market of the California wheat farmer. The broad Pacific will always be the pathway upon which will be carried the staple products of the Pacific coast and the Far West. The sailing vessel can carry these products much cheaper to the markets of Europe and Asia than can the iron horse to the markets of the eastern portion of our country, and thus eliminate all fear of competition in these products. Up to this time the chief market of the Pacific coast for its staple products has been Europe, but the markets of Asia and the Orient are becoming more and more inviting; their possibilities can hardly be overestimated. These markets naturally belong to the Pacific coast, to our Western farmers.

The impression that eastern Siberia has large tracts of fertile land whose products threaten oriental competition with the agricultural products of the Pacific coast is not founded on fact. Americans who have lived in that country for years and who have made a study of its resources and American consular officers familiar with eastern Siberia unite in the statement that that vast region is not adapted to successful wheat culture and that any fear of competition in agricultural products may be dismissed from the American mind.

In the advance sheets of the Consular Reports, No. 1278, issued by the Bureau of Foreign Commerce under date of March 1, 1902, Richard T. Greener, American commercial agent, writing from Vladivostock, Siberia, under date of December 31 last, says:

> At present there is no great demand for American machinery. The market is well stocked, crops are bad, money is scarce, the Government is closing down on credit, and the condition of the Siberian peasant farmer is deplorable. Efforts are being made to teach the peasant how to farm. In the United States the foreign immigrant learns by every day example rather than by theory. The Siberian peasant is not used to severe and unremitting labor. He has few wants and many holidays. Lately some highly colored reports have reached us from America as to what Siberia was capable of doing in an agricultural way. It is suggested that American flour mills on the Pacific coast will soon be closed in consequence of the millions of acres here ready to be devoted to cereals. An uncertain climate, imperfect machinery, and unreliable labor are not factors for successful competition with the United States.

Notwithstanding the cheap transportation offered emigrants and the development of virgin soils, famine seems a periodical visitor, and it is here to-day. The central governments are literally besieged with clamors for bread, for medicine, for work, grain, hay—anything. Tomak, Perm, Kerson, Yaronej, Khalkinsk, all join in this demand. It is safe to say that the United States need have no immediate fear of competition from this quarter, whether it be in grain or machinery, canned goods or cotton goods, production of gold or building of ships.

Mr. Greener has been stationed at Vladivostock for several years and speaks authoritatively of local conditions.

In advance sheets of Consular Reports, No. 1353, Henry B. Miller, American consul at Niuchwang, Manchuria, referring to the growing popularity of American flour, writes as follows, under date of March 4, 1902:

The result of the year's trade shows that American flour is increasing in popularity even in this great grain-producing country, where corn, wheat, millet, and beans grow to perfection. The first considerable shipment of flour to this port was in the year 1899, when the quantity imported amounted to 104,854 haikwan taels ($75,547). The following year, on account of the troubles in China, this amount was increased to 231,957 haikwan taels ($167,171). This greatly augmented importation, due to the abnormal conditions, led to the prediction that there would be a considerable falling off in future imports, but the amount brought in during the year 1901—176,821 haikwan taels ($129,243)—indicates that the Chinese desire for American flour has become permanent, and that it will continue to be imported in increasing quantities.

It will be seen that two strong facts stand out clearly: First, the inability of eastern Siberia to compete with Americans in the oriental trade for food stuffs; second, the growing popularity of American flour in Manchuria.

It will therefore be conceded, I take it, that the demand of Europe and the Orient for the staple products of our Western and Pacific coast section is ample to absorb the whole surplus.

Then again, Mr. Chairman, the growth of the irrigated area of the United States shows a decrease in the production of staple products. Two of the foremost products of the great Middle West are wheat and corn. Now, I take it that the State of California probably shows as much progress in the matter of irrigation as any other State in the Union, and our State shows a decrease during the last ten years in the amount of wheat and corn raised.

The census statistics show that in the State of California the acreage in wheat from 1889 to 1899 decreased 5.5 per cent, while the acreage in corn shows the large decrease of 23.3 per cent. There is also in this State, relatively, a large decrease in the number of bushels of these products produced during this decade, there being over 4,000,000 bushels less of wheat produced in 1899 than in 1889, and about a million less bushels of corn produced between said years. While this large decrease, which necessarily will probably become greater and greater as the irrigated area increases, particularly in the amount available for shipping, there will be a corresponding increase in the acreage planted and output of fruits, vegetables, and alfalfa. I will append to my remarks, without taking the time to read, some tables of the last census which further illustrate just what I have referred to.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have attempted to show, within the short time at my disposal, first, that the present bill is not unconstitutional; and, second, that it will not injuriously affect the interests of the East.

What are the provisions of the bill under consideration? Briefly, it provides that all moneys received from the sales of public lands in the States and Territories in the arid and semiarid regions, excepting the 5 per cent set aside by law for educational purposes, shall be reserved and set aside as a special fund to be known as the "reclamation fund," to be used in the examination and survey, and for the construction and maintenance of irrigation works. The Secretary of the Interior is directed to make examinations and surveys for and to locate and construct irrigation works and pay the cost thereof out of this fund. He is to report to Congress at the beginning of each session the results of such examinations and surveys, giving estimates of costs of all contemplated works, the quantity and location of the lands which can be irrigated therefrom, and also all facts relative to the practicability of each irrigation project.

Before letting contract or giving notice of intention to enter upon the work of any particular project the land necessary for the irrigation works, as well as that which is susceptible of irrigation from said works, is to be withdrawn from settlement, except that the latter is open to settlement only under the homestead law, in tracts of not less than 40 or more than 160 acres. When the necessary amount is available in the reclamation fund the contract for the completion of the project which is deemed practicable may be let, at which time the limit of area, per entry, which the Secretary shall deem necessary for the support of a family upon the lands in question, also the charges which shall be made per acre upon said entries, and also upon lands held in private ownership which may be irrigated from said project, and the number of annual installments, not exceeding 10, which shall be paid with a view to returning to the reclamation fund the estimated cost of the construction of the project, shall be apportioned equitably. Those desiring to use the water made available must be actual bona fide residents on such land, and the right to such use of water under the provisions of this act shall be appurtenant to the land irrigated, and beneficial use shall be the measure and the limit of the right.

This in brief covers the principal features of the bill. It does not take from the Treasury directly any money. It provides an automatic method in probably as safe and simple form as can be devised. The time is ripe for the entry upon this legislation.

Private enterprise has done much in the line of irrigation in the West. Our States also have given much thought and attention to this important question, but, as the President states in his message, in effect, there are enterprises that are too vast for private effort, and again:

Nor can it be best accomplished by the individual States acting alone; far-reaching interstate problems are involved, and the resources of single States would often be inadequate. It is properly a national function, at least in some of its features.

This bill deals with the problem in its national features. It is an experiment along practical lines, and, in my judgment, does not of necessity commit the Congress of the United States irrevocably to this policy if it should not prove a success. It can be abandoned should experience require it. The possibilities of a broad policy of national irrigation are so great, the area of our country to be affected so vast, that I believe we owe it to the nation to inaugurate this policy without further delay.

APPENDIX A.

[From President's message to Congress, December, 1901.]

The forests alone can not, however, fully regulate and conserve the waters of the arid region. Great storage works are necessary to equalize the flow of streams and to save the flood waters. Their construction has been conclusively shown to be an undertaking too vast for private effort. Nor can it be best accomplished by the individual States acting alone. Far-reaching interstate problems are involved; and the resources of single States would often be inadequate. It is properly a national function, at least in some of its features. It is as right for the National Government to make the streams and rivers of the arid region useful by engineering works for water storage as to make useful the rivers and harbors of the humid region by engineering works of another kind. The storing of the floods in reservoirs at the headwaters of our rivers is but an enlargement of our present policy of river control, under which levees are built on the lower reaches of the same streams.

The Government should construct and maintain these reservoirs as it does other public works. Where their purpose is to regulate the flow of streams the water should be turned freely into the channels in the dry season to take the same course under the same laws as the natural flow.

The reclamation of the unsettled arid public lands presents a different problem. Here it is not enough to regulate the flow of streams. The object of the Government is to dispose of the land to settlers who will build homes upon it. To accomplish this object water must be brought within their reach.

The pioneer settlers on the arid public domain chose their homes along streams from which they could themselves divert the water to reclaim their holdings. Such opportunities are practically gone. There remain, however, vast areas of public land which can be made available for homestead settlement, but only by reservoirs and main-line canals impracticable for private enterprise. These irrigation works should be built by the National Government. The lands reclaimed by them should be reserved by the Government for actual settlers, and the cost of construction should, so far as possible, be repaid by the land reclaimed. The distribution of the water, the division of the streams among irrigators, should be left to the settlers themselves in conformity with State laws and without interference with those laws or with vested rights. The policy of the National Government should be to aid irrigation in the several States and Territories in such manner as will enable the people in the local communities to help themselves, and as will stimulate needed reforms in the State laws and regulations governing irrigation.

The reclamation and settlement of the arid lands will enrich every portion of our country, just as the settlement of the Ohio and Mississippi valleys brought prosperity to the Atlantic States. The increased demand for manufactured articles will stimulate industrial production, while wider home markets and the trade of Asia will consume the larger food supplies and effectually prevent Western competition with Eastern agriculture. Indeed, the products of irrigation will be consumed chiefly in upbuilding local centers of mining and other industries, which would otherwise not come into existence at all. Our people as a whole will profit, for successful homemaking is but another name for the upbuilding of the nation.

The necessary foundation has already been laid for the inauguration of the policy just described. It would be unwise to begin by doing too much, for a great deal will doubtless be learned, both as to what can and what can not be safely attempted, by the early efforts, which must of necessity be partly experimental in character. At the very beginning the Government should make clear, beyond shadow of doubt, its intention to pursue this policy on lines of the broadest public interest. No reservoir or canal should ever be built to satisfy selfish personal or local interests, but only in accordance with the advice of trained experts, after long investigation has shown the locality where all the conditions combine to make the work most needed and fraught with the greatest usefulness to the community as a whole. There should be no extravagance, and the believers in the need of irrigation will most benefit their cause by seeing to it that it is free from the least taint of excessive or reckless expenditure of the public moneys.

Whatever the nation does for the extension of irrigation should harmonize with and tend to improve the condition of those now living on irrigated land. We are not at the starting point of this development. Over two hundred millions of private capital has already been expended in the construction of irrigation works, and many million acres of arid land reclaimed. A high degree of enterprise and ability has been shown in the work itself; but as much can not be said in reference to the laws relating thereto. The security and value of the homes created depend largely on the stability of titles to water; but the majority of these rest on the uncertain foundation of court decisions rendered in ordinary suits at law. With a few creditable exceptions, the arid States have failed to provide for the certain and just division of streams in times of scarcity. Lax and uncertain laws have made it possible to establish rights to water in excess of actual uses or necessities, and many streams have already passed into private ownership, or a control equivalent to ownership.

Whoever controls a stream practically controls the land it renders productive, and the doctrine of private ownership of water apart from land can not prevail without causing enduring wrong. The recognition of such ownership, which has been permitted to grow up in the arid regions, should give way to a more enlightened and larger recognition of the rights of the public in the control and disposal of the public water supplies. Laws founded upon conditions obtaining in humid regions, where water is too abundant to justify hoarding it, have no proper application in a dry country.

In the arid States the only right to water which should be recognized is that of use. In irrigation this right should attach to the land reclaimed and be inseparable therefrom. Granting perpetual water rights to others than users, without compensation to the public, is open to all the objections which apply to giving away perpetual franchises to the public utilities of cities. A few of the Western States have already recognized this, and have incorporated in their constitutions the doctrine of perpetual State ownership of water.

The benefits which have followed the unaided development of the past justify the nation's aid and cooperation in the more difficult and important work yet to be accomplished. Laws so vitally affecting homes as those which control the water supply will only be effective when they have the sanction of the irrigators; reforms can only be final and satisfactory when they come through the enlightenment of the people most concerned. The larger development which national aid insures should, however, awaken in every arid State the determination to make its irrigation system equal in justice and effectiveness that of any country in the civilized world. Nothing could be more unwise than for isolated communities to continue to learn everything experimentally, instead of profiting by what is already known elsewhere. We are dealing with a new and momentous question in the pregnant years while institutions are forming, and what we do will affect not only the present but future generations.

Our aim should be not simply to reclaim the largest area of land and provide homes for the largest number of people, but to create for this new industry the best possible social and industrial conditions; and this requires that we not only understand the existing situation, but avail ourselves of the best experience of the time in the solution of its problems. A careful study should be made, both by the nation and the States, of the irrigation laws and conditions here and abroad. Ultimately it will probably be necessary for the nation to cooperate with the several arid States in proportion as these States by their legislation and administration show themselves fit to receive it.

APPENDIX B.

[Agricultural and irrigation statistics of the State of California, from Bulletin No. 164, Census Bureau, Twelfth Census of the United States.]

A "farm," as defined by the Twelfth Census, includes all the land, under one management, used for raising crops and pasturing live stock, with the wood lots, swamps, meadows, etc., connected therewith. It includes also the house in which the farmer resides, and all other buildings used by him in connection with his farming operations.

The farms of California, June 1, 1900, numbered 72,542, and had a value of $707,912,960. Of this amount $77,468,000, or 10.9 per cent, represents the value of buildings, and 630,444,960, or 89.1 per cent, the value of land and improvements other than buildings. On the same date the value of farm implements and machinery was $21,311,670, and that of live stock $87,303,325. These values, added to that of farms, give $796,527,955, the "total value of farm property."

INCREASE IN THE NUMBER OF FARMERS IN CALIFORNIA.

From 1850 to 1900 the population of California increased from 92,597 to 1,485,053, or sixteenfold, while the number of farms increased from 872 to 72,542, or over eightyfold. In other words, from 1850 to 1900 the number of farms, and hence the number of persons operating them as owners or tenants, increased faster than the population. This statement applies also to the decades, 1850 to 1860, 1870 to 1880, and 1890 to 1900.

California, with its varied topography, soil, and climate, offers an interesting field for the study of irrigation. No other State produces such a variety of crops, and in no other State have agricultural lands, as such, reached the selling price of the semitropical fruit orchards of southern California. Except in a few localities there is not, in California, the absolute necessity for irrigation that exists in most other Western States and Territories. On nearly all of the lands that are irrigated some crops will grow, in ordinary seasons, without artificial application of water. The more valuable crops, however, usually require irrigation, and with it the yield of all crops is increased greatly. An irrigation system is an insurance against crop failure in years of drought.

The following table is a comparative exhibit by counties of the number of irrigators and the acreages irrigated in 1889 and in 1899:

In the ten years ending with 1899 the number of irrigators in the State increased from 13,732 to 25,675, or 87 per cent, and the area irrigated from 1,004,233 acres to 1,446,114 acres, or 44 per cent. Of the total improved acreage in 1900, 12.1 per cent was reported as irrigated, but the area actually irrigated was much greater than reported. In many localities large areas which are of little value without water and upon which water has not been directly applied, have been made fertile by the seepage from neighboring irrigated land. In most cases the enumerators did not report such land as irrigated, but correspondence established the fact that extensive areas were benefited in this way.

[Mr. BURKE of South Dakota addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the proposition that was read to the House at my request a short time ago I now propose as a substitute, and ask that it be read by the Clerk.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Wait until we get in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers the following as a substitute for the bill, which the Clerk will read.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it has already been read.

The CHAIRMAN. It was read in the gentleman's own time for the information of the House, but was not offered at that time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of it at this time be dispensed with.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I hope the gentleman will not consume all the time of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the reading of the substitute at this time be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TONGUE. Should not the vote be taken first on the committee amendment changing the number of the section?

The CHAIRMAN. That is merely to change the number of the section, and under the rule of the House the Clerk is authorized to do that without the vote of the committee. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk again read the substitute offered by Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I only desire to say that this is a bill——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I beg the Chair's pardon.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. By what process of reasoning or by what rule is debate closed on a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair debate is not closed on the substitute.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on the substitute close in five minutes.

Mr. RAY of New York. The gentleman from Indiana started in to speak on the substitute offered by him, and was informed by the Chair, as I understood the Chair, that debate was not in order. I may be wrong, but I understood the Chair to so state.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was under the impression that this was offered as an amendment to the last section of the bill, and therefore that debate was not in order. It was offered as a substitute, and debate is in order. The motion to close debate can not be entertained until debate has begun. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TONGUE. I raise the point of order on the proposed substitute that it is not germane.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] was debating the substitute before the point of order was made, and was taken off the floor by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the substitute is in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, this proposition, with the change made necessary by the fact that Utah has since been admitted as a State, is the fruit of the labors of a special committee appointed in the Fifty-second Congress to investigate the subject, and it proposes what I consider a foundation for a rational and reasonable system of irrigation if the States and Territories avail themselves of the grant. It was elaborately reported upon by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] and his committee, and it presents in a concrete and careful form the proposition to cede to the Territories and States the lands within their borders, to permit them, with the aid of private irrigation enterprise thereby encouraged, to irrigate these lands and these sections and States asking for legislation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I move that debate close in five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. I move that debate close on this section and all amendments at once.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I accept that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that debate on this section and amendments be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill——

The CHAIRMAN. The question must first be taken on the substitute.

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman from Wyoming has just moved that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MONDELL. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. RAY of New York. I renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the simple motion that the committee rise would be in order; but the gentleman from Wyoming made a motion that the committee rise and report the, bill with the sundry amendments, favorably to the House, and that is not in order pending a vote upon the substitute. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON].

The question being taken, the substitute was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill, with amendments, to the House with the recommendation that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TAWNEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 3057) appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States and Territories to the construction of irrigation works for the reclamation of arid lands, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, and with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MONDELL. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment? If not, they will be submitted by the Chair in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RAY of New York. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 146, nays 55, answered "present" 18, not voting 132, as follows:

On motion of Mr. MONDELL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CUBAN RECIPROCITY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was ordered printed, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I deem it important before the adjournment of the present session of Congress to call attention to the following expressions in the message which, in the discharge of the duty imposed upon me by the Constitution, I sent to Congress on the first Tuesday of December last:

"Elsewhere I have discussed the question of reciprocity. In the case of Cuba, however, there are weighty reasons of morality and of national interest why the policy should be held to have a peculiar application, and I most earnestly ask your attention to the wisdom, indeed to the vital need, of providing for a substantial reduction in the tariff duties on Cuban imports into the United States. Cuba has in her constitution affirmed what we desired, that she should stand in international matters in closer and more friendly relations with us than with any other power, and we are bound by every consideration of honor and expediency to pass commercial measures in the interest of her material well-being."

This recommendation was merely giving practical effect to President McKinley's words, when, in his messages of December 5, 1898, and December 5, 1899, he wrote:

"It is important that our relations with this people (of Cuba) shall be of the most friendly character and our commercial relations close and reciprocal. * * * We have accepted a trust, the fulfillment of which calls for the sternest integrity of purpose and the exercise of the highest wisdom. The new Cuba, yet to arise from the ashes of the past, must needs be bound to us by ties of singular intimacy and strength if its enduring welfare is to be assured. * * * The greatest blessing which can come to Cuba is the restoration of her agricultural and industrial prosperity."

Yesterday, June 12, I received, by cable from the American minister in Cuba, a most earnest appeal from President Palma for "legislative relief before it is too late and [his] country financially ruined."

The granting of reciprocity with Cuba is a proposition which stands entirely alone. The reasons for it far outweigh those for granting reciprocity with any other nation, and are entirely consistent with preserving intact the protective system under which this country has thriven so marvelously. The present tariff law was designed to promote the adoption of such a reciprocity treaty, and expressly provided for a reduction not to exceed 20 per cent upon goods coming from a particular country, leaving the tariff rates on the same articles unchanged as regards all other countries. Objection has been made to the granting of the reduction on the ground that the substantial benefit would not go to the agricultural producer of sugar, but would inure to the American sugar refiners. In my judgment provision can and should be made which will guarantee us against this possibility; without having recourse to a measure of doubtful policy, such as a bounty in the form of a rebate.

The question as to which, if any, of the different schedules of the tariff ought most properly to be revised does not enter into this matter in any way or shape. We are concerned with getting a friendly reciprocal arrangement with Cuba. This arrangement applies to all the articles that Cuba grows or produces. It is not in our power to determine what these articles shall be; and any discussion of the tariff as it affects special schedules, or countries other than Cuba, is wholly aside from the subject-matter to which I call your attention.

Some of our citizens oppose the lowering of the tariff on Cuban products, just as three years ago they opposed the admission of the Hawaiian Islands, lest free trade with them might ruin certain of our interests here. In the actual event their fears proved baseless as regards Hawaii, and their apprehensions as to the damage to any industry of our own because of the proposed measure of reciprocity with Cuba seem to me equally baseless. In my judgment no American industry will be hurt, and many American industries will be benefited by the proposed action. It is to our advantage as a nation that the growing Cuban market should be controlled by American producers.

The events following the war with Spain and the prospective building of the isthmian canal render it certain that we must take in the future a far greater interest than hitherto in what happens throughout the West Indies, Central America, and the adjacent coasts and waters. We expect Cuba to treat us on an exceptional footing politically, and we should put her in the same exceptional position economically. The proposed action is in line with the course we have pursued as regards all the islands with which we have been brought into relations of varying intimacy by the Spanish war. Porto Rico and Hawaii have been included within our tariff lines, to their great benefit as well as ours, and without any of the feared detriment to our own industries. The Philippines, which stand in a different relation, have been given substantial tariff concessions.

Cuba is an independent Republic, but a Republic which has assumed certain special obligations as regards her international position in compliance with our request. I ask for her certain special economic concessions in return, these economic concessions to benefit us as well as her. There are few brighter pages in American history than the page which tells of our dealings with Cuba during the past four years. On her behalf we waged a war, of which the mainspring was generous indignation against oppression, and we have kept faith absolutely. It is earnestly to be hoped that we will complete in the same spirit the record so well begun, and show in our dealings with Cuba that steady continuity of policy which it is essential for our nation to establish in foreign affairs if we desire to play well our part as a world power.

We are a wealthy and powerful nation; Cuba is a young Republic, still weak, who owes to us her birth, whose whole future, whose very life, must depend on our attitude toward her. I ask that we help her as she struggles upward along the painful and difficult road of self-governing independence. I ask this aid for her because she is weak, because she needs it, because we have already aided her. I ask that open-handed help, of a kind which a self-respecting people can accept, be given to Cuba, for the very reason that we have given her such help in the past.

Our soldiers fought to give her freedom; and for three years our representatives, civil and military, have toiled unceasingly, facing disease of a peculiarly sinister and fatal type with patient and uncomplaining fortitude, to teach her how to use aright her new freedom. Never in history has any alien country been thus administered with such high integrity of purpose, such wise judgment, and such single-minded devotion to the country's interests. Now, I ask that the Cubans be given all possible chance to use to the best advantage the freedom of which Americans have such right to be proud and for which so many American lives have been sacrificed.

WHITE HOUSE, June 13, 1902.

LOUISIANA EXPOSITION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was ordered printed, and referred to the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State covering a statement showing the receipts and disbursements of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Company for the month of April, 1902, furnished by the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Commission, in pursuance of section 11 of the act to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the purchase of the Louisiana territory, etc., approved March 3, 1901.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, June 13, 1902.

The PRESIDENT:

Referring to Senate Document No. 71, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, the undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Congress, copy of a communication from the president of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Commission, furnishing, in pursuance of section 11 of an act to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the purchase of the Louisiana Territory, etc., approved March 3, 1901, a statement showing the receipts and disbursements of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Company for the month of April, 1902.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN HAY.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 11, 1902.

LOUISIANA PURCHASE EXPOSITION COMMISSION, ST. LOUIS,
Helena, Mont., May 19, 1902.

SIR: In conformity with the requirements of section 11 of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the purchase of the Louisiana Territory by the United States by holding an international exhibition of arts, industries, manufactures, and the products of the soil, mine, forest, and sea in the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri," we have the honor to report for and in behalf of the Commission the receipts and disbursements of the exposition for the month of April, 1902, as shown by the annexed statement of the treasurer of the exposition company, submitted by Walter B. Stevens, secretary. The balance of $1,104,035.73 is ample to provide for the immediate requirements of the company.

Hon. David B. Francis, president of the exposition company, has informed the Commission that the city of St. Louis has advertised for bids for the sale of bonds of the city aggregating $5,000,000, for the purpose of securing that sum of money for delivery to the exposition company as contemplated by the act of Congress. For your information we herewith inclose copy of the advertisement. We are advised that the bonds will meet a ready sale at the rate of interest prescribed, and it is therefore reasonable to conclude that the proceeds of the sale of bonds will be placed in the treasury of the company in the near future.

Yours, respectfully, THOS. H. CARTER, President.

Attest:

JOSEPH FLORY, Secretary.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 6110. An act granting an increase of pension to Charles A. Cooke—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 9544. An act granting an increase of pension to George W. Barry.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 2921. An act to place Henry Biederbick, Julius R. Frederick, Francis Long, and Maurice Connell, on the retired list of enlisted men of the Army.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WACHTER also, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had presented this day to the President of the United States for his approval bills of the following titles:

H. R. 11591. An act for the relief of Stanley & Patterson, and to authorize a pay director of the United States Navy to issue a duplicate check;

H. R. 11657. An act allowing the construction of a dam across the St. Lawrence River;

H. R. 8129. An act to amend sections 4076, 4078, and 4075 of the Revised Statutes;

H. R. 3309. An act to remove charge of desertion against Ephraim H. Gallion; and

H. R. 5094. An act for the relief of the persons who sustained damage by the explosion of an ammunition chest of Battery F, Second United States Artillery, July 16, 1894.

TERRITORIAL INDEBTEDNESS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 9334) to amend an act to prohibit the passage of special or local laws in the Territories, to limit the Territorial indebtedness, etc., with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL REQUESTS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted Mr. SMITH of Kentucky to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Stephen Camplin, Fifty-sixth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. COOMBS, for ten days.

And then, on motion of Mr. PAYNE (at 5 o'clock and 2 minutes), the House adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. WANGER, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 12706) to authorize the West Elizabeth and Dravosburg Bridge Company to construct and maintain a bridge across Monongahela River, in the State of Pennsylvania, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2480); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. SENATE.

SATURDAY, June 14, 1902.

Prayer by Rev. F. J. PRETTYMAN, of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. NELSON, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved.

GUY N. STOCKSLAGER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 12th instant, certain information relative to the employment of Lieut. D. H. Jarvis in the Revenue-Cutter Service at Nome, Alaska, in the summer and fall of 1900, and the employment by him of Guy N. Stockslager, etc.; which, on motion of Mr. COCKRELL, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. C. R. McKenney, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9334) to prohibit the passage of special or local laws in the Territories, to limit Territorial indebtedness, etc.

The message also announced that the House had passed with amendments the bill (S. 3057) appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States and Territories to the construction of irrigation works for the reclamation of arid lands; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 2921) to place Henry Bieberbick, Julius R. Frederick, Francis Long, and Maurice Connell on the retired list of enlisted men of the Army; and

A bill (H. R. 9544) granting an increase of pension to George W. Barry.

Mr. FORAKER, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3560) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their cars with automatic couplers and continuous brakes and their locomotives with driving-wheel brakes, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1893, and amended April 1, 1896, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported an amendment providing for the survey of Walker River Reservation, Nev.; the Uintah Reservation, Utah; the Spokane Reservation, Wash., etc., intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill, and moved that it be referred, with the accompanying paper, to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BEVERIDGE introduced a bill (S. 6161) providing for the election of a Delegate from the Indian Territory to the House of Representatives of the United States, and defining the qualifications of electors in said Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 6162) granting an increase of pension to David Bussard; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 6163) for the relief of J. W. Smart; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6164) for the relief of B. G. Chandler; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PETTUS introduced a bill (S. 6165) amending the act of March 2, 1901, entitled "An act to carry into effect the stipulations of article 7 of the treaty between the United States and Spain," and so forth; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLAY introduced a bill (S. 6166) for the relief of R. F. Powell, administrator of George R. Powell, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PROCTOR introduced a bill (S. 6167) authorizing the President of the United States to nominate Capt. Charles Edgar Clark, United States Navy, to be a rear-admiral of the senior grade on the active list; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ADMISSION OF CUBA.

Mr. ELKINS. I introduce a joint resolution, and ask that it be read and lie on the table. I wish to submit some remarks on it at an early day.

The joint resolution (S. R. 115) providing for the admission of the Republic of Cuba into the Union as a new State was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That Congress doth consent that the territory properly included within and rightfully belonging to the Republic of Cuba may be erected into a new State, to be called the State of Cuba, with a republican form of government, to be adopted by the people of said Republic, by deputies in convention assembled, with the consent of the existing Government, in order that the same may be admitted as one of the States of this Union.

2. And be it further resolved, That the foregoing consent of Congress is given upon the following conditions and with the following guaranties, to wit: First, the constitution of said State, with the proper evidence of its adoption by the people of said Republic of Cuba, shall be transmitted to the President of the United States, to be laid before Congress for its final action on or before the 1st day of January, 1904. Second, said State, when admitted into the Union, after ceding to the United States all public edifices, fortifications, barracks, ports and harbors, navy and navy-yards, docks, magazines, arms, armaments, and all other property and means pertaining to the public defense belonging to said Republic of Cuba, shall retain all the public funds, debts, taxes, and dues of every kind which may belong to or be due and owing said Republic; and shall also retain all the vacant and unappropriated lands lying within its limits, to be applied to the payment of the debts and liabilities of said Republic of Cuba, and the residue of said lands, after discharging said debts and liabilities, to be disposed of as said State may direct; but in no event are said debts and liabilities to become a charge upon the Government of the United States.

And be it further resolved, That if the President of the United States shall, in his judgment and discretion, deem it most advisable, instead of proceeding to submit the foregoing resolution to the Republic of Cuba as an overture on the part of the United States for admission, to negotiate with that Republic: then

Be it resolved, That a State, to be formed out of the present Republic of Cuba, with a republican form of government and with Representatives in Congress, shall be admitted into the Union by virtue of this act on an equal footing with the existing States as soon as the terms and conditions of such admission shall be agreed upon by the Governments of the Republic of Cuba and the United States; and that the sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to defray the expenses of missions and negotiations to agree upon the terms of said admission and cession either by treaty to be submitted to the Senate or by articles to be submitted to the two Houses of Congress, as the President may direct.

SURVEY OF ISTHMUS OF DARIEN.

Mr. SCOTT. I introduce a joint resolution, and ask that it be read and lie on the table. I shall call it up at some future day.

The joint resolution (S. R. 116) providing for a survey of the Isthmus of Darien for canal purposes was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed on the application of the parties in interest, if such application is made before the convening of Congress in December, 1902, to make a detail of a proper officer or officers of the Corps of Engineers of the Army to superintend and direct a survey upon the Isthmus of Darien, for the purpose of verifying the surveys already made for interoceanic canal at the narrowest part of the isthmus, and to report to Congress on the character of ground that said canal would have to be built over, the quality and strength of the rock in the range of mountains through which tunnel would have to be bored, and whether or not the rock so located is sufficiently strong to carry the weight of the tunnel without requiring lining, and all other facts in connection with this short route: Provided, That at the time such application is made the parties desiring the verification of the surveys and other facts, as set forth, shall deposit with the Secretary of War such sum of money as, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, shall be sufficient to pay the expenses of making such survey and a report thereon, except the pay and allowances according to law that are allowed to officers so detailed to superintend such work and surveys.

MISSOURI VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate a statement showing the various classes of Missouri volunteers, militia and home guards, that were in service during the civil war, the designations of the organizations composing them, and the laws, orders, and regulations under which they were raised; also what organizations or classes of these troops are recognized by the War Department as having been in the military service of the United States, and what organizations or classes are not so recognized.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, being House bill 14019, report No. 1919.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 14019) making appropriations for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with, that the bill be read, and that the amendments of the committee may be considered when they are reached as the reading proceeds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments shall first receive consideration. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. Before proceeding with the bill, it has been suggested to me by Senators interested in the isthmian canal measure that inasmuch as the time has been fixed for a final vote on Thursday next we agree that on and after Monday the Senate shall meet at 11 o'clock, there being a number of Senators who desire to debate the bill in the meantime.

Mr. HALE. Including Monday?

Mr. ALLISON. Including Monday.

Mr. MORGAN. From Monday to Thursday, inclusive.

Mr. CULLOM. Beginning on Monday?

Mr. MORGAN. Beginning on Monday.

Mr. HOAR. I wish the Senator would omit Monday. It makes a difference of but one hour and it would be an inconvenience to some Senators to come here at 11 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. MORGAN. Since the agreement was made of a day for taking the final vote on the canal bill a number of gentlemen who I did not know would want to speak, and I had no idea of it, have told me that they desire to be heard upon that measure. I see that they are to be excluded unless we can have a little longer time for our sessions from Monday until Thursday. That is my reason for making the request. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not object.

Mr. HOAR. I shall not object. I merely made the suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate meet at 11 o'clock on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday of next week.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the reading of the bill may be now proceeded with.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "General expenses," in the appropriation for "Executive office," on page 2, line 19, before the word "computer," to insert "civil engineer or;" in line 23, before the word "dollars," to insert "two hundred;" on page 3, line 6, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "four;" in the same line, after the word "dollars," to strike out "clerk, $720" and insert "two clerks, at $720 each," and in line 15, before the word "dollars," to strike out "sixty-eight thousand eight hundred and twenty-four" and insert "sixty-nine thousand nine hundred and forty-four;" so as to read:

Civil engineer or computer, $1,500; 2 clerks, at $900 each; clerk, who shall be a stenographer and typewriter, $900; messenger, $480; janitor, $1,200; steam engineer, $900; 3 firemen, at $480 each; 2 elevator operators, at $360 each; 3 watchmen, at $480 each; 2 laborers, one of whom shall also act as messenger and substitute elevator operator, at $365 each; 2 laborers, at $360 each; property clerk, $1,600; deputy property clerk, $1,400; 2 clerks, at $720 each; messenger, $600; inspector of plumbing, $2,000; 7 assistant inspectors of plumbing, 1 at $1,200, and 6 at $1,000 each; 5 members of the plumbing board, at $900 each; harbor master, $1,200; in all, $69,944.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 5, after the word "dollars," to strike out "two assistant assessors, at $1,600 each," and insert "assistant assessor, $2,000; assistant assessor, $1,600;" in line 20, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "five;" and in line 23, before the word "hundred," to strike out "forty-two thousand nine" and insert "forty-three thousand six;" so as to make the clause read:

For assessor's office: For assessor, $3,500; assistant assessor, $2,000; assistant assessor, $1,600; * * * clerk to board of assistant assessors, $1,500; messenger and driver, for board of assistant assessors, $600; in all, $43,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 23, to insert:

For salaries and expenses of the excise board, $5,500, to be expended as now provided by law: Provided, That all receipts from liquor licenses in the District of Columbia shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 3, to strike out:

TAXATION OF REAL ESTATE.

SEC. 4. That hereafter all real estate in the District of Columbia subject to taxation, including improvements thereon, shall be taxed 1½ per cent upon the assessed valuation thereof, and whenever a subdivision of any portion of said real estate is made and recorded with the surveyor of the said District, the board of assistant assessors of said District are hereby authorized and directed to reassess said property so subdivided, and the tax on said reassessment shall be due and payable at the semiannual payment of taxes next following said reassessment.

That hereafter property used for educational purposes that is not used for private gain shall be exempt from taxation, and all other property used for educational purposes shall be assessed and taxed as other property is assessed and taxed.

That in all cases where assessments of benefits for street extensions in the District of Columbia have been, or may hereafter be, levied, or assessed, payment of the same shall be made in five equal annual installments, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum until paid: Provided, That the accounting officers of the District, in making payments of awards for damages, shall first deduct the amount of the assessment for benefits.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 77, after line 15, to insert as a new section the following:

TAXATION OF PERSONAL PROPERTY.

SEC. 5. That in order to provide revenues to meet the appropriations made by this act and appropriations to be hereafter made to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, it is further enacted: That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to appoint, to take effect July 1, 1902, two competent persons, at annual salaries of $3,000 each, who, with the assessor of the District of Columbia as chairman, shall compose a board of personal-tax appraisers for said District of Columbia. Said appraisers shall have been bona fide residents of the District of Columbia for at least five years prior to the date of their appointment, and, under the direction and supervision of the said assessor, they shall assess personal property in said District as follows:

That hereafter the assessor of the District of Columbia, or his successor in office, shall annually cause to be prepared a printed blank schedule of all tangible personal property and all general merchandise or stock in trade, owned or held in trust or otherwise, subject to taxation under the provisions of this section, and of the classes of corporations and companies to be assessed, together with the rate of tax prescribed, to which shall be appended an affidavit in blank, setting forth that the foregoing presents a full and true statement of all such personal property, taxable capital, or other basis of assessment, or either, as the case may be. When said schedule is ready for delivery, notice thereof shall be given by the assessor by advertisement for three successive secular days in one or more of the daily newspapers published in said District, and a copy of said schedule shall be delivered to any citizen applying therefor at the office of the assessor.

Every person, association, corporation, firm, or company in said District liable to taxation hereunder, and every association, company, executor, administrator, guardian, or trustee holding personal property in trust liable to taxation hereunder, shall, within thirty days after the last publication of said advertisement, as aforesaid, fill out the proper blanks in said schedule with a full and true statement, as in this section hereinbefore required, and make and sign an affidavit to the truth thereof, as aforesaid, before the assessor or one of the other members of the said board of personal-tax appraisers, and the members of the said board are hereby authorized to administer such and all oaths in connection with their duties as assessor and appraisers without charge, or before any person authorized by law to administer oaths; and the address in the District of Columbia of the person, corporation, or company making affidavit shall in each case be given below his, its, or their signature, and thereupon said board of personal-tax appraisers, or any one of the members thereof, shall assess said property at its fair cash value, and enter the same in the columns upon said blanks provided for that purpose, and the amount thus ascertained shall be entered upon the books for taxation for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1902, and each fiscal year thereafter: Provided, That if any person, firm, association, corporation, company, administrator, executor, guardian, or trustee shall fail to make and deliver to the assessor or one of the said appraisers, within thirty days after the last advertisement of the notice hereinbefore required, the schedule of his or its said personal property, owned, held in trust, or otherwise, as provided for in this section, then the said board of personal-tax appraisers hereinbefore provided for shall without delay, from the best information they can procure, make an assessment against such person, firm, association, corporation, company, administrator, executor, guardian, or trustee, to which they shall add 5 per cent thereof: Provided further, That if the said board of personal-tax appraisers be not satisfied as to the correctness of the return of personal property made by any person, firm, association, corporation, company, administrator, executor, guardian, or trustee, said board may reject said return, and said board, or any one of the members thereof may, from the best information he or they can procure, or by making such an examination of the personal property as may be practicable, assess the same in such amount as may to him or them seem just; and notice of the rejection of the sworn return shall be given to the party interested by leaving the same at the address given in said return, and in all such cases there shall be a right of appeal from the action taken by said appraisers to the board of personal-tax appeals, hereinafter provided for, or to their successors in office, within fifteen days after delivery of said notice of rejection as aforesaid: And provided further, That if any person, firm, association, corporation, company, administrator, executor, guardian, or trustee shall make a false affidavit touching the matters herein provided for, he or they shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and upon conviction thereof shall be subject to the penalties for that offense now provided by section 858 of the Code of the District of Columbia.

PAR. 2. On all tangible personal property, assessed at a fair cash value (over and above the exemptions provided in this section), including vessels, ships, boats, tools, implements, horses and other animals, carriages, wagons, and other vehicles, there shall be paid to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia 1½ per cent on the assessed value thereof.

PAR. 3. Dealers in general merchandise of every description shall pay to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia 1½ per cent on the average stock in trade for the preceding year.

PAR. 4. Hotel companies and the proprietors of hotels shall pay to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia 1½ per cent on the assessed value of their furniture.

PAR. 5. Each national bank as the trustee of its stockholders, through its president or cashier, and all other incorporated banks and trust companies in the District of Columbia, through their presidents or cashiers, and all gas, electric lighting, and telephone companies, through their proper officers, shall make affidavit to the board of personal tax appraisers on or before the 1st day of August in each year as to the amount of its or their gross earnings for the preceding year ending the 30th day of June, and shall pay to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia 4 per cent per annum on such gross earnings. The real estate owned by each national or other incorporated bank, and each trust, gas, electric lighting, and telephone company in the District of Columbia shall be taxed as other real estate in said District: Provided, That street railroad companies shall continue to pay the 4 per cent per annum on their gross receipts and other taxes as provided by existing law, and insurance companies shall continue to pay the 1½ per cent on premium receipts, as provided by section 650 of the Code of the District of Columbia.

PAR. 6. All companies who guarantee the fidelity of any individual or individuals, such as bonding companies, shall pay to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia 1½ per cent of their gross receipts in the District of Columbia.

PAR. 7. Savings banks paying interest to their depositors shall, through their president or cashier, make affidavit to the board of personal-tax appraisers on or before the 15th day of July in each year as to the amount of their surplus and undivided profits, and shall pay to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia a sum equal to 1½ per cent on the amount of their surplus and undivided profits on the 30th day of June preceding.

PAR. 8. The capital stock of all corporations, other than those herein provided for, organized in the District of Columbia or under the laws of any of the States or Territories of the United States chiefly for the purpose of and transacting business within the District of Columbia, except those exempted by the laws relating to the District of Columbia, shall be appraised in bulk at its fair cash value by the board of personal-tax appraisers, and the corporation issuing the same shall be liable for the tax thereon according to such value, and shall pay to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia a sum equal to 1½ per cent on the assessed valuation thereof; but from the assessed valuation of such capital stock shall first be deducted the value of any and all real estate owned by such corporation in said District, which real estate shall be separately taxed against said corporation: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to include newspaper, real estate, and mercantile companies, which by reason of incorporation receive no special franchise or privilege; but all such corporations shall be rated, assessed, and taxed as individuals conducting business in similar lines are rated, assessed, and taxed.

PAR. 9. The following personal property shall be exempt from taxation:

First. The personal property of all library, benevolent, charitable, and scientific institutions incorporated under the laws of the United States or of the District of Columbia.

Second. Libraries, schoolbooks, wearing apparel, articles of personal adornment, all family portraits, heirlooms, and art collections.

Third. Household property and other belongings in use in any dwelling house of the value of $1,000.

PAR. 10. That said two appraisers hereinbefore provided for, with the assessor of the District of Columbia as chairman, shall compose a board of personal-tax appeals, and as such board of personal-tax appeals shall convene in a room, to be provided therefor by the said assessor, on the 15th day of November in each year, and public notice of the time and place of such meeting shall be given by advertisement for two consecutive secular days in two daily newspapers published in the District of Columbia. It shall be the duty of the board of personal-tax appeals, between the date of convening and December 15 of each year, to hear all appeals made by any person or persons against the assessments made by the board of personal-tax appraisers and to impartially equalize the value of said personal property as a basis for assessment.

Any two members of the said board shall constitute a quorum for business, and in the absence of the assessor a temporary chairman shall be selected. They shall be empowered to diminish or increase such assessments as they may believe to have been returned at other than their true value to such amount as, in their opinion, may be the value thereof, and the action of said board in such cases shall be final. Said appraisers shall also perform such other official duties as may be required of them by the assessor of the District of Columbia: Provided, That in case the appraisers shall fail to complete any of the duties in this section to be by them performed within the time provided therefor the taxation provided by this section shall not by reason thereof be invalid; but such appraisers shall proceed with all reasonable diligence to complete such duties, and their acts shall be valid as if performed within the time fixed therefor. If, at any time within any current year, property subject to taxation under the provisions of this section shall have been omitted from assessment, said board of personal-tax appraisers shall immediately proceed to assess the same for the then current year, giving notice in writing to the persons or corporations so assessed, who shall have a right of appeal within ten days from date of said notice.

PAR. 11. That when the taxes on personal property due and payable in each year shall not be paid on or before the 1st day of June, then and in that event the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia, or his deputy, may distrain sufficient goods and chattels found within the District of Columbia and belonging to the person, firm, association, corporation, company, administrator, executor, guardian, or trustee charged with such tax to pay the taxes remaining due, under the provisions of this law, from such person, firm, association, corporation, company, administrator, executor, guardian, or trustee, together with the penalty thereon and the costs that may accrue; and for want of such goods and chattels said collector of taxes may levy upon and sell at auction the estate and interest of such person, firm, association, corporation, company, administrator, executor, guardian, or trustee in any parcel of land in said District; and in the case of the levy on any estate or interest in land the proceedings subsequent to sale thereof shall be the same as now provided by law in the case of sales for arrears of taxes against real estate; and in the case of distraint of personal property or the levy upon real estate as aforesaid the collector of taxes shall immediately proceed to advertise the same by public notice to be posted in the office of said collector and by advertisement, three times within one week, in one or more of the daily newspapers published in said District, stating the time when and the place where such property shall be sold, the last publication to be at least six days before the date of sale, and if said taxes and penalty thereon, and the costs and expenses which shall have accrued thereon, shall not be paid before the day fixed for such sale, which shall not be less than ten days after said levy or taking of said property, the collector shall proceed to sell at public auction in his office, to the highest bidder, such property, or so much thereof as may be needed to pay such taxes, penalty, and accrued costs and expenses of such distraint and sale. Said collector shall report in detail, in writing, every distraint and sale of personal property to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia or their successors in office, and his accounts in respect to every such distraint or sale shall forthwith be submitted to the auditor of the District of Columbia and be audited by him. Any surplus resulting from such sale over and above such taxes, costs, and expenses shall be paid into the Treasury, and upon being claimed by the owner or owners of the goods and chattels aforesaid shall be paid to him or them upon the certificate of the collector of taxes stating in full the amount of such excess.

PAR. 12. That all taxes levied under the foregoing provisions of this section shall be due, payable, and collectible at the same time and times as the general tax on real estate in said District, and shall be subject to the same penalties for nonpayment thereof until distraint or sale as hereinbefore provided.

PAR. 13. That private banks or bankers not incorporated shall pay a tax of $500 per annum. Every person, firm, company, or association not incorporated having a place of business where credits are opened by the deposit or collection of moneys or currency subject to be paid or remitted upon draft, check, or order, or where money is advanced or loaned on stocks, bonds, bullion, bills of exchange, or promissory notes or where stocks, bonds, bills of exchange or promissory notes are received for discount or for sale, shall be regarded as a private bank or banker.

PAR. 14. General brokers shall pay a tax of $500 per annum. Every person, firm, company, or association not incorporated (except insurance and real-estate brokers acting as such) that solicits business from the general public by advertisement or otherwise, and that purchases, sells, or negotiates for others securities, shares, stocks, bonds, exchange, bullion, coin, money, bank notes, or promissory notes, or that deals in futures on market quotations of prices or values on merchandise, shares, stocks, bonds, or other securities, or accepts margins on prices or values of said shares, stocks, bonds, merchandise, or securities, shall be deemed a general broker: Provided, That the Washington Stock Exchange, through its president or treasurer, shall pay to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia a sum equal to $500 per annum in lieu of tax on the members thereof: Provided further, That any broker who is a member of a regularly organized stock exchange located outside of the District of Columbia and transacting a brokerage business therein, shall pay a sum equal to $100 per annum to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia: And be it further provided, That if any person or firm shall have paid the tax in this section provided for banks and bankers, such person or firm shall not again be taxed as a broker or brokers.

PAR. 15. Note brokers shall pay a tax of $200 per annum. Every person, firm, company, or association not incorporated (except private banks and bankers) that loans money on promissory notes without real estate or collateral security or advances money on personal property as security without possession of said personal property shall be deemed a note broker.

PAR. 16. The taxes for said private banks and bankers, general brokers, and note brokers shall be paid to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia, and shall date from the 1st day of July in each year and expire on the 30th day of June following. Said taxes shall date from the 1st day of the month in which the liability begins, and payment shall be made for a proportionate amount.

PAR. 17. Any person or persons violating any of the provisions of this section shall be liable to a penalty of not exceeding $500 for each offense, said penalty to be imposed, upon conviction in the police court of the District of Columbia, as other fines and penalties are imposed, and said court is hereby invested with jurisdiction thereof; and in default of the payment of said penalty the person or persons so convicted shall be imprisoned, in the discretion of the court, not exceeding six months.

PAR. 18. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a clerk and assistant clerk to said board of personal-tax appraisers at annual salaries of $1,400 and $1,000 each, and three inspectors at annual salaries of $1,200 each, all of whom shall perform such duties as may be assigned to them by the chairman of said board; and to pay the salaries of the two personal-tax appraisers, the clerk and assistant clerk to said board, and the three inspectors aforesaid for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1902, and $6,000 for books, stationery, printing, and other incidental expenses, including the hire of temporary clerks, not to exceed $1,000, the sum of $18,000 is hereby appropriated.

Mr. McCOMAS. I should like to have some information with respect to this amendment. I have looked over the printed bill, and I have failed to discover any provision which in imposing a personal tax in the District, 7 miles square, arranges for the exemption of people who are taxed in their States and who may under this procedure be taxed here also.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no.

Mr. McCOMAS. I have not yet found in the bill any provision, which ought to be included, so that it may have flexible operation and provide that persons who are taxed in the States should not be taxed here, inasmuch as they would then be taxed twice.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill does not tax anybody in that way. It does not cover that class of cases. We had that especially in view, and there is no attempt to double tax anybody.

Mr. McCOMAS. Of course there is no such attempt——

Mr. COCKRELL. And it does not do it either.

Mr. McCOMAS. But suppose a man is taxed here on the 1st of June, and taxed in his State on the 1st of May or the 1st of July, what then?

Mr. ALLISON. What particular item, for illustration, can the Senator give wherein there is possible taxation of the character which he states?

Mr. McCOMAS. I am asking for information.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think there is any provision in this bill anywhere——

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no effort in that line.

Mr. ALLISON. Which will tax any property outside of the District of Columbia. The proposition is to tax tangible property found here.

Mr. McCOMAS. It should be taxed here.

Mr. ALLISON. It should be taxed here.

Mr. McCOMAS. And there is no personal tax upon persons who come from the various States, making double taxation in respect of their property.

Mr. ALLISON. Not that I know of.

Mr. McCOMAS. Such a system would lessen population and retard the growth of the capital.

Mr. ALLISON. We have endeavored to make the taxes rest as lightly and gently as possible upon all the people who dwell here and to tax no one else.

Mr. McCOMAS. The Senator from Iowa introduced a bill, Senate bill 5897, proposing a tax upon banks and trust companies at the rate of 2 per cent on their annual gross earnings. This amendment makes it 4 per cent on the annual gross earnings.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me to say one word in respect to the bill which I introduced? When the Committee on Appropriations found that it was necessary for the committee to deal with the matter of taxation, a number of most respectable gentlemen residing in the District presented to me a bill upon the subject, and I introduced it by request, with a view of having it printed so that I could read it, not desiring to go through that vast amount of manuscript. But I will say to the Senator that not many of the suggestions of that bill are embraced in the amendment.

Mr. McCOMAS. The tax imposed is 4 per cent upon the gross earnings. Is that right?

Mr. ALLISON. Four per cent upon the gross earnings.

Mr. McCOMAS. And it applies to banks, trust companies, railroads, electric-lighting companies, all alike?

Mr. ALLISON. It applies to all of them.

Mr. McCOMAS. Is a discrimination made between local enterprises and foreign companies doing business here? As I gather from a hasty reading of this bill, the tax upon foreign insurance companies, bonding companies, and the like, doing business here, is a tax upon the actual receipts here of the companies in their business? Is that right?

Mr. ALLISON. So far as insurance companies are concerned, we have not interfered with the tax levied upon them by the law passed last year.

Mr. GALLINGER. The insurance law.

Mr. ALLISON. An insurance law covering all insurance taxation.

Mr. McCOMAS. Foreign companies doing business here are taxed what upon their actual business?

Mr. ALLISON. Foreign companies doing business——

Mr. McCOMAS. Either loaning money or doing other business.

Mr. ALLISON. Foreign companies who are here, having their chief place of business here, are taxed 1½ per cent on their capital.

Mr. McCOMAS. On their capital?

Mr. ALLISON. On their capital.

Mr. McCOMAS. On their whole capital?

Mr. ALLISON. On their whole capital, if this the habitat or location of the company.

Mr. McCOMAS. Then it is not a foreign company.

Mr. ALLISON. It may be chartered elsewhere——

Mr. McCOMAS. You mean a company chartered elsewhere, but having its principal office here?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; having its principal office here.

Mr. McCOMAS. If the chairman will bear with me, under the general law, I think perhaps under the code, existing trust companies, for instance, pay the District of Columbia in lieu of personal taxes 1½ per cent on their gross earnings for the preceding year.

Mr. ALLISON. That we change to 4 per cent.

Mr. McCOMAS. Four per cent; and that applies uniformly to trust companies, national banks, electric lighting, gas, telephone companies, and all?

Mr. ALLISON. It applies to all of them.

Mr. McCOMAS. And they are satisfied with that taxation?

Mr. ALLISON. Most of them are, I think. There was some little opposition from the banks, but there is no real objection.

Mr. McCOMAS. As the tax is imposed upon the gross earnings the amount of capital is not concerned.

Mr. ALLISON. It is not concerned.

Mr. McCOMAS. You tax them upon their real estate and gross earnings.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes. Their gross earnings are small and the taxation is small. We have endeavored to deal with these corporations justly, as far as we could, without oppressing them.

I move, on behalf of the committee, to insert the following proviso on page 89, at the end of paragraph 15, line 15:

Provided, That exception shall be made of cooperative associations whose business is restricted to the members of such association.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair so lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be informally laid aside until we finish the pending appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside until the bill under consideration is completed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 90, after line 23, to insert as a new section the following:

LICENSE TAXES.

SEC. 6. That no person shall engage in or carry on any business, trade, profession, or calling in the District of Columbia for which a license tax is imposed by the terms of this section without having first obtained a license so to do. Applications for licenses shall be made to the assessor of the District of Columbia, and no license shall be granted until payment for the same shall have been made. Every license shall specify by name the person, firm, or corporation to which it shall be issued, the business, trade, profession, or calling for which it is granted, and the location at which such business, trade, profession, or calling is to be carried on. Licenses granted under the terms of this section may be assigned or transferred on application upon the conditions applicable to granting the original licenses, and the assessor shall issue a certificate of such assignment or transfer upon the payment to the District of Columbia of a fee of 50 cents therefor. All licenses and transfers issued or granted shall be signed by the assessor of the District of Columbia and impressed with the seal of his office.

PAR. 2. That when more than one business, trade, profession, or calling for which a license is herein prescribed shall be carried on by the same person, the license tax shall be paid for each such business, trade, profession, or calling.

PAR. 3. That all licenses issued shall date from the 1st day of November in each year and expire on the 31st day of October following, except as hereinafter provided. Licenses issued at any time after the beginning of the license year shall date from the 1st day of the month in which the license was issued and end on the last day of the license year above prescribed, and payment shall be made of the proportionate amount of the annual license tax: Provided, That in cases where the tax is less than $5 per annum the license shall terminate one year from the 1st day of the month in which the license was issued.

PAR. 4. That no person holding a license under the terms of this section shall willfully suffer or allow any other person chargeable with a separate license to operate under his license.

PAR. 5. That all licenses granted under the terms of this section must be conspicuously posted on the premises of the licensee. Said licenses shall be accessible at all times for inspection by the police or other officers duly authorized to make such inspections. Licensees having no located place of business shall exhibit their licenses when requested to do so by any of the officers above named.

PAR 6. That no person shall set up, operate, or conduct any business or device by or in which any person, animal, or living object shall act or be exposed as a target for any ball, projectile, missile, or thing thrown or projected, for or in consideration of profit or gain, directly or indirectly.

PAR. 7. That apothecaries or druggists shall pay a license tax of $5 per annum. Every person who sells patent medicines, or manufactures, compounds, sells, or dispenses medicines by prescription or otherwise from a located place of business shall be regarded as an apothecary or druggist.

PAR. 8. That auctioneers shall pay a license tax of $100 per annum. Hereafter the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to prevent fraudulent transactions on the part of commission merchants," approved March 21, 1892, shall be applicable to all licensed auctioneers, their agents and employees.

PAR. 9. That commission merchants shall pay a license tax of $40 per annum. Every person, firm, or corporation that acts as agent for others in negotiating sales or purchases of goods, wares, or merchandise, live stock, produce, etc., or negotiates freights for railroads, ships, or vessels, or for the shippers or consignees of freights carried by railroads, ships, or vessels, shall be regarded as a commission merchant.

PAR. 10. That cattle dealers shall pay a license tax of $15 per annum: Provided, That one person only shall be entitled to do business under each license. Every person who makes a business of trading, buying, or selling horses, cattle, sheep, or hogs shall be regarded as a cattle dealer.

PAR. 11. That proprietors or owners of hacks, coaches, omnibuses, carriages, wagons, and other passenger vehicles for hire shall pay license taxes as follows: Vehicles drawn by one animal, $6 per annum; autovehicles, automobiles, electromobiles, or other horseless vehicles by whatever name called, and vehicles drawn by more than one animal, $12 per annum. Licenses issued under this section shall date from July 1 in each year. The driver of every licensed passenger vehicle, while transacting business as such driver, shall wear conspicuously upon his breast a badge numbered to correspond with the license of his vehicle. The badge shall be furnished by the District of Columbia and a tax of 50 cents shall be charged therefor in addition to the amount of the vehicle license.

PAR. 12. That proprietors or owners of livery stables shall pay license taxes as follows: For stables containing fifteen stalls or less, $25 per annum, and $1 per annum additional for each stall in addition to fifteen: Provided, That nothing in this paragraph shall be so construed as to exempt livery-stable keepers from paying additional license taxes for operating any description of vehicles occupying the public stands.

PAR. 13. That proprietors or owners of establishments where autovehicles of any pattern, description, or motor power whatsoever are kept for hire or are kept or stored for others, for profit or gain, shall pay a license tax of $25 per annum for 15 vehicles or less, and $1 additional for each vehicle in addition to 15: Provided, That nothing in this paragraph shall be so construed as to exempt the owner of any vehicle using the public stands from paying the additional license tax provided in paragraph 11 of this section.

PAR. 14. That persons, firms, or corporations operating vehicles for hire or for the transportation of passengers in the District of Columbia with sufficient regularity to enable the public to take passage therein at any point intermediate to the stable or stand of such vehicle, or operate such vehicle over a route sufficiently definite to enable the public to ascertain the streets and avenues on which such vehicle can be found en route, shall pay license taxes as follows: For each vehicle with a seating capacity not to exceed 10 passengers, $6 per annum; for each vehicle with a seating capacity exceeding 10 passengers, $12 per annum. No license shall be issued under the terms of this paragraph without the approval of the Commissioners of the District of of Columbia.

PAR. 15. That real estate brokers or agents shall pay a license tax of $50 per annum. Every person who sells, or offers for sale, as the agent for others, real estate, wherever located, including mining and quarry property, or who makes or negotiates loans thereon, or who rents houses, buildings, stores, or real estate, or who collects rents for others, shall be regarded as a real estate broker or agent: Provided, That the practice of a profession in connection with the real estate business shall not exempt any person from the requirements of this paragraph who would otherwise be liable hereunder.

PAR. 16. That persons, firms, corporations, or associations transacting the business of the purchase or sale of securities, stocks, shares, or certificates, based upon an estimated value after a lapse of a certain period of time, or who undertake to guarantee the holder of said securities, stocks, shares, or certificates certain sums of money based upon investments after the lapse of a certain time, or who promise to divide with the holders or investors of said securities, stocks, shares, or certificates, or with the heirs or assigns of such holders or investors, any profit which may accrue from their investments at maturity, shall pay a license tax of $100 per annum: Provided, That this paragraph shall not apply to any fire or life insurance company or building association allowed to transact business as such in the District of Columbia.

PAR. 17. That railroad ticket brokers shall pay a license tax of $25 per annum.

PAR. 18. That caterers or purveyors to residents, tenants, or sojourners in flats, apartment houses, or similar structures, or who serve meals or refreshments, as defined in paragraph 20 of this section, to casual visitors, or who serve customers with food or refreshments on orders, shall pay a license tax of $10 per annum.

PAR. 19. That victualers, owners of restaurants, oyster houses, cookshops, ice-cream parlors, dairy lunches, or eating houses, by whatsoever name designated, where food, meals, or refreshments are served to transient customers, to be eaten on the premises where sold, shall pay a license tax of $18 per annum: Provided, That this paragraph shall not apply to the proprietors of hotels nor to private boarding houses where board and lodging are provided by the week or month.

PAR. 20. That owners, lessees, or managers of theaters having a stage and movable scenery used for the purpose of acting, performing, or playing any play, farce, interlude, opera, or other theatrical or dramatic performance, or any scene, section, or portion of any play, farce, burlesque, or drama of any description, for gain, shall pay a license tax of $100 per annum: Provided, That licenses may be granted for theatrical performances for one week on the payment of $20, and for less than one week on the payment of $10: And provided further, That the proprietors of buildings, other than theaters, where exhibitions, lectures, or entertainments of any description are conducted for gain shall pay a license tax of $100 per annum; or for lesser periods as follows: Three dollars per day, or $10 for the first week, and $5 for each subsequent consecutive week: And provided further, That for entertainments, concerts, or performances of any kind given in church premises or private residences where the proceeds are intended for church or charitable purposes, and where no rental is charged, no license tax shall be required.

PAR. 21. That every person who exhibits paintings, pictures, or works of art, or makes industrial, mechanical, agricultural, food, or floral exhibitions, including cattle and poultry shows, freaks and museum attractions, side shows, and all other lawful exhibitions not otherwise provided for, shall pay a license tax of $3 per day, or $10 for the first week and $5 additional for each subsequent consecutive week, and for an annual license the tax shall be $100.

PAR. 22. That persons conducting concerts, entertainments, or balls to which an admission fee is charged, directly or indirectly, shall pay a license tax of $3 for each day or night.

PAR. 23. That proprietors or owners of any circus shall pay a license tax of $200 per day.

PAR. 24. That owners or lessees of grounds used for horse racing, tournaments, athletic sports, baseball, football, polo, golf, and kindred games, or where feats of horsemanship are performed, to which admission fees are charged or which are used for profit or gain, directly or indirectly, shall pay a license tax of $20 per week or $5 per day.

PAR. 25. That owners or lessees of grounds or premises used for picnics or lawn fêtes, or resorts where theatrical or musical attractions or other amusements are presented, to which admission fees are charged or which are used for profit or gain, directly or indirectly, and which are not taxed under any other paragraph of this section, shall pay a license tax of $3 per day or $10 per week and $5 additional for each subsequent consecutive week, or for an annual license a tax of $100.

PAR. 26. That owners or lessees of buildings used for skating rinks, fairs, carnivals, or amusements not otherwise provided for in this section shall pay a license tax of $3 per day, or $10 for the first week and $5 additional for each subsequent consecutive week, or for an annual license a tax of $100.

PAR. 27. That owners or lessees of shooting galleries, fencing schools, public gymnasiums, places where firearms of any description are used, or schools where the art of self-defense is taught shall pay a license tax of $12 per annum: Provided, That no place of business or shooting gallery where firearms are to be used shall be licensed until the inspector of buildings for the District of Columbia shall furnish a certificate that suitable precautions have been taken for the public safety by the erection of iron shields and such appliances as in his judgment may be necessary: And provided further, That before such license shall be issued the proprietor shall furnish to the assessor of the District of Columbia the written consent of a majority of the occupants and residents on the same side of the square or block in which the proposed gallery is to be located, and also on the confronting side of the square fronting opposite to the same. The major and superintendent of police is hereby authorized to prescribe the caliber of firearms and kind of cartridges to be used in such licensed places.

PAR. 28. That proprietors or owners of apparatus or machines known as merry-go-rounds, flying horses, or similar devices for amusement shall pay a license tax of $12 for the first week and $10 for each subsequent consecutive week, or $3 per diem: Provided, That license therefor may be refused in the discretion of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

PAR. 29. That proprietors or owners of slot or automatic machines, so called (telephones excepted), by which objects, pictures, or figures are presented to public view or musical or vocal exhibitions are automatically given on the deposit of money or metal, or where a pecuniary consideration is received for the use of said apparatus or machines, shall pay a license tax of $2 per annum for each machine or apparatus: Provided, That on the payment of a license tax of $50 per annum the number of machines at any one location shall not be limited: And provided further, That no license shall be issued for less than $2.

PAR. 30. That owners or managers of Turkish, Russian, or medicated baths shall pay a license tax of $50 per annum.

PAR. 31. That owners or managers of massage establishments shall pay a license tax of $50 per annum: Provided, That no license shall be issued under this paragraph without the approval of the major and superintendent of police.

PAR. 32. That mediums, clairvoyants, soothsayers, fortune tellers, palmists, or phrenologists, by whatsoever name called, conducting business for profit or gain, directly or indirectly, when permitted to practice their calling in the District of Columbia, shall pay a license tax of $50 per annum: Provided, That no license shall be issued without the approval of the major and superintendent of police.

PAR. 33. That hucksters or produce dealers at large shall pay a license tax of $18 per annum for each vehicle used in the conduct of their business. Licenses issued under this paragraph shall date from April 1 in each year. Every person who vends or sells fresh, smoked, or salt fish, meats, oysters, clams, shellfish, poultry, game, butter, eggs, vegetables, fruits, berries, candies, nuts, groceries, or produce of any kind from a vehicle of any description shall be regarded as a huckster. Every driver shall be furnished with a badge corresponding to the number of his license, which shall be worn conspicuously while transacting business, and a similar number on metal shall also be furnished him which shall be attached to his vehicle: Provided, That no license shall be required of any person bringing to and selling at the several markets produce of his own raising: And provided further, That raisers of produce shall not be exempt from the license tax imposed unless they sell such produce at the several markets or by the wholesale in cart, wagon, or carload lots.

PAR. 34. That fuel hucksters shall pay a license tax of $5 per annum for each vehicle used in the conduct of their business. Every person who vends or sells fuel, oils, gasoline, wood, coal, and so forth, from house to house from vehicles of any description shall be regarded as a fuel huckster.

PAR. 35. That peddlers shall pay a license tax of $18 per annum. Licenses issued under this paragraph shall date from April 1 of each year, and one person only shall be entitled to operate thereunder. Every person who vends or sells from house to house miscellaneous articles of merchandise or personal property of any description, either as a foot peddler or selling from a vehicle, shall be regarded as a peddler.

PAR. 36. That brewers or manufacturers of fermented liquors of any description for sale, and brewers' agents, shall pay a license tax of $250 per annum: Provided, That agent's license under this paragraph shall only authorize the licensee to conduct his business with the goods of the brewer represented by such agent: And provided further, That a licensed brewer's solicitor, whose business is confined to soliciting orders for his principal, shall not be liable for the license tax provided for in this paragraph.

PAR. 37. That distillers shall pay a license tax of $250 per annum.

PAR. 38. Section 8 of "An act regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1893, is hereby amended by striking out therefrom the words "The fee for a wholesale license shall be $250 per annum, and for a barroom license $400 per annum," and inserting in lieu thereof the words: "The fee for a wholesale license shall be $300 per annum, and for a barroom license $800 per annum."

PAR. 39. That billposters and persons engaged in the business of painting or placing signs or advertisements on land, buildings, billboards, fences, or other structures in the District of Columbia visible from a street or other public space shall pay an annual tax of $20 before engaging in said business. No person shall place, exhibit, maintain, or continue any advertisement or poster except upon such land, houses, buildings, billboards, fences, or other structures as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may, in their discretion, authorize in writing for that purpose. The said written authority shall only be granted in resident streets upon application made in writing and signed by a majority of the residents on the side of the square in which said display is to be made and also the side of the confronting square: Provided, That nothing in this paragraph shall apply to persons who advertise a business, exhibition, or entertainment on the premises where the same is conducted, nor to signs relating to the sale, rent, or lease of lands when the sign or advertisement is on the land referred to in the said sign or advertisement. Any person violating any of the provisions of this paragraph shall, upon conviction thereof in the police court of the District of Columbia, be punished by a fine of not more than $200, and after conviction of any such violation the offender shall be liable to a further fine of not more than $10 for each and every day thereafter that said violation of law shall continue.

PAR. 40. That owners or lessees of any buildings, structures, or tanks used for the storage of any description of inflammable oils in quantities exceeding five barrels shall pay a license tax of $10 per annum and shall have the approval of the fire marshal before license is granted.

PAR. 41. That owners or lessees of laundries operated otherwise than by hand power shall pay a license tax of $20 per annum. Owners or lessees of laundries operated by hand labor shall pay a license tax of $10 per annum.

PAR. 42. That proprietors or owners of intelligence offices, information bureaus, registries, or employment offices, by whatsoever name called, shall pay a license tax of $10 per annum.

PAR. 43. That dealers in second-hand personal property (books excepted) shall pay a license tax of $40 per annum. Every person who buys, sells, trades, exchanges, or deals in old gold, silver, jewelry, precious stones, iron, metals of all kinds, cordage, tentage, hides, pelts, glass, rags, paper, ordnance, ship chandler's stores, junk, furniture, clothing, or second-hand personal property of any description shall be regarded as a second-hand dealer.

PAR. 44. Pawnbrokers shall continue to pay to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia $100 for license, and be subject to the regulations prescribed by existing law.

PAR. 45. Keepers of billiard, bagatelle, jenny lind, and pool tables, shuffleboards, or any table upon which legitimate games are played within the District of Columbia for public use, or for profit or gain, shall continue to pay to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia $12 per annum license for each table and be subject to the provisions of the act of Congress approved February 25, 1897, entitled "An act to license billiard and pool tables in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes."

PAR. 46. That any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall, on conviction thereof in the police court of the District of Columbia, be punished by a fine of not more than $500 for each offense, and in default of payment by imprisonment not exceeding thirty days, in the discretion of the court, except as otherwise provided in this section.

PAR. 47. That for the purposes of this section the word "person" shall signify and include firms, corporations, companies, associations, executors, administrators, guardians, or trustees; the word "agent" shall signify and include every person acting for another; the word "merchandise" shall signify and include every article of commerce, whether sold in bulk or otherwise; the word "dealers" shall signify and include every person engaged in selling or offering for sale any description of merchandise or property. Words of one number shall signify and include words of both numbers, respectively, and words of one gender shall signify and include words of every gender, respectively: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be interpreted as repealing any of the police or building regulations of the District of Columbia regarding the establishment or conduct of the businesses, trades, professions, or callings herein named.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I wish to ask the chairman or some member of the committee about the provision for auditor's office. It is the proviso on page 7. Does the proviso contemplate that the auditor of the District of Columbia shall be able to suspend the action of the Commissioners in any case in the operation of their office where he is in doubt as to the legality of a voucher for payment for service done under the act of the Commissioners while it is being done, before it is done, and that ruling then shall be final upon the auditor of the Treasury? Do not the Commissioners require flexibility in their office? They must take some responsibility to have some things done. Is it intended that the auditor can veto and stop an act of the Commissioners because he has a doubt and then go to the Treasury and get a ruling from the Treasury auditor, and then the Auditor of the Treasury shall be bound by that hasty ruling, if thereafter he thought it was good and had said it was bad, or if thereafter he found it to be bad and had then said it was good, so that he could not still allow or reject the payment? It seems from the reading of the proviso——

Mr. COCKRELL. Does not the Senator remember that the Comptroller of the Treasury, not the Comptroller of the Currency, is the sole arbiter in all these matters?

Mr. MCCOMAS. I do, and I stated that in my question in substance.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Auditors for the departments have a right to confer with the Comptroller in advance of their decision of controverted questions, and he is required, under the law, to give an opinion to them. This places the auditor of the District of Columbia in the same position, so that there will be no controversies and no disallowed claims. It is only to make the two work harmoniously together. The Comptroller would suspend all these accounts any way, if he decided that they had no authority, and so it is better to know in advance. It works more harmoniously and smoothly. There is no overriding of the Commissioners or overriding of anybody else. It is done simply to make the machinery work more smoothly and to enable the District Commissioners and the auditor to act more advisedly themselves.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Would it not happen if, for instance, the Commissioners were proceeding to have the streets cleaned, that the auditor of the District might have doubts in respect to the expenditure for some reason——

Mr. COCKRELL. It could not refer to a question of that kind. It is only as to whether the law authorizes the expenditure of money. That is all. It does not have anything to do with any other controverted question. It is only in regard to the settlement of accounts. The auditor has no jurisdiction over those other accounts anyway. This, as I said, simply refers to the method of adjusting the accounts. It is for the purpose of getting the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury in advance as to whether they will be allowed to spend a certain amount of money for doing a particular kind of work.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I understand, if they are proceeding, for instance, to do the work of street cleaning the auditor may have some doubt about the expenditure. Mr. Petty is an experienced man, I know. He applies to the Treasury Department for information. Now, the Treasury authority by this act is bound to be of the same mind when he comes to pass upon the vouchers that he was when applied to by this auditor.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the law.

Mr. MCCOMAS. It is the law.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is the law.

Mr. MCCOMAS. In respect to the particular inquiry made by the auditor of the District, if the auditor of the District says to the Commissioners, "I have gone to the Treasury to ask a ruling upon this point, and under that ruling, if you proceed to spend this money, you can not have an allowance for that expenditure," thereupon the Commissioners must say, "We can not proceed to make the expenditure."

Mr. COCKRELL. It is the same way with the Secretary of War and the same way with the President. It is the same way with the head of every other Department and every other officer of the Government. I could give the Senator a number of instances where a Comptroller has decided against the Secretaries where they proposed to do certain work. The auditor submitted it to the Comptroller and the Comptroller decided they could not do it, and that was the end of it. As a matter of course, it is the end of it when that is done. It is the end of it in the whole administration of the Government.

Mr. McCOMAS. Is it true in the administration of the General Government that no disbursement of public money is valid unless countersigned by the auditor?

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no. He has to pass upon it, and after the money has been expended he says whether the officer who expended it shall be allowed credit for it.

Mr. McCOMAS. That is right.

Mr. COCKRELL. Frequently an officer is in doubt about whether he will get credit for a certain item or not. He submits it to the Auditor and the Auditor submits it to the Comptroller, and if the Comptroller decides that he will not credit him for it he does not do it. That is the only way.

Mr. McCOMAS. That has been the practice for years.

Mr. COCKRELL. It has been the practice for years.

Mr. McCOMAS. I, myself, am quite familiar with that practice here.

Mr. COCKRELL. The proviso on page 7 brings the District of Columbia in harmony with that provision.

Mr. McCOMAS. But there is here an added feature. It frequently happens that the Engineer Commissioner or the Commissioner in charge of the schools or police asks whether if a certain disbursement were made he would receive credit in settling for the District with the Treasury.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not understand that to be the case. The money is already expended.

When the auditor of the District of Columbia is in doubt as to the legality of an account or voucher for payment upon which he is required to act, he may apply to the Comptroller of the Treasury for a decision upon the question involved.

If the Comptroller shall advise him that he can audit favorably that account, then when his accounts come to the accounting officers of the Treasury there is the opinion of the Comptroller as to what they shall do.

Mr. McCOMAS. I see that is the purpose of that clause.

Mr. ALLISON. If he has any doubt about an account that is presented to him for audit where the money has been expended he can then ask the Comptroller, as any other auditor or any other head of a Department now, whether, the money having been expended in a particular way, the account will be audited. The decision of the Comptroller is binding.

Mr. McCOMAS. So far as the chairman of the committee has stated, this is an effort to legalize what for many years, as many of us know, has been the custom of these officers when in doubt, not only in the Departments, but in the District of Columbia, to endeavor to obtain informal information from the Treasury Department whether a certain disbursement was such that it would be allowed by the Comptroller. The Chairman has answered as to the part which he has read. Between lines 8 and 13 it is provided that—

The auditor of the District of Columbia shall continue to prepare and countersign all checks issued by the disbursing officer, and no check involving the disbursement of public moneys by the disbursing officer shall be valid unless countersigned by the auditor of the District of Columbia.

Mr. President, it will often be the case that a Commissioner about to expend money here, and in doubt whether or not he will receive credit in settlement with the Treasury, may want advance information, and the part of the section read by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations makes legal what has been a practice for years by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and their auditors.

But this provision goes still further, and puts absolutely in the power of the auditor, who might have an honest doubt, a capricious doubt, who might have an errant construction, to say, "I will not sign any check because I have a different construction of the statute," not simply in the case where he has, under the prior law, applied to the Comptroller of the Treasury for information in advance, but absolutely without limit, it is said, in these lines, that he can refuse to sign any check, and a disbursing officer's check can not be paid unless the auditor says so.

I think in trying to do what has been stated by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] and by the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. ALLISON] you perhaps have gone far enough when you go to line 8. I have had twenty years' observation of these matters in the other House, here, and in the city of Washington. You add lines here which make the auditor of the District of Columbia an absolute autocrat. You say that no check involving the expenditure of public money by the disbursing officer shall be valid unless countersigned by the auditor of the District of Columbia.

At present you have a very conscientious, faithful, and experienced auditor; but I am inclined to think the Commissioners of the District of Columbia should have some power in respect of their administration. You have put lines in this provision which will interfere with the work of each of the Commissioners. For instance, the Engineer Commissioner has contracts for existing work on bridges, streets, and everything of that kind, and it is provided here that no money shall be paid without the assent of the auditor, that those matters shall stand still; and they must stand still if the auditor says he will not countersign a single check. This will cause injury to many people who have contracts or undertakings with this Government, which make them look first to this man, and not to the comptroller, who has a prior right to approve these disbursements. He can make a ruling which will be binding hereafter.

You further say, after unnecessary words, that this auditor shall be required to countersign these checks. Of course he ought to do it. But you say there shall be no disbursements unless the checks are countersigned. I think there ought to be some control of this discretion. I think you ought to say, where he has applied in good faith to the Comptroller and has ascertained that the Comptroller will not allow the account, that in such case he may have ample discretion to refuse to pay, and in case he does refuse to pay, then he is authorized to stop the disbursement, and when he does stop it by refusing to countersign, that shall stop the procedure in respect to that matter. You ought not, however, to give him that broad power contained between lines 8 and 13, which makes him, without limitation upon his action, without any limitation upon his discretion, able to say "I will not countersign a check," and if he will not countersign a check the machinery must stop in that particular direction or in as many directions as he may conclude that he will exercise that very great and unrestricted power.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no danger in the provision, I assure the Senator, but great benefit.

Mr. McCOMAS. I am on the side of the Senator. I am in sympathy with any measure which will prevent the wrongful payment of money, and you do a good thing when you send the officer to the Comptroller and let his doubts be confirmed by the Comptroller; but in such cases you give him authority, absolutely without any other control, to refuse to countersign the check for the disbursing officer.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me a moment, these paragraphs have no special connection with each other. There is a District disbursing officer and a deputy disbursing officer. The Commissioners of the District are authorized to make requisitions upon the Treasury for considerable sums of money, up to $200,000. Now, the disbursing officer, who gives, say, a bond of $25,000, or whatever it may be, oftentimes has in hand large sums of money. These sums of money can be paid out by him from day to day in cash, but where he draws a check that check has to be countersigned by the auditor in order to keep run of these disbursements. It is really a check upon the disbursing officer in addition to the bond, and it is a valuable one.

Mr. COCKRELL. If this system had been in force in the Census Office, we should not have had the scandal we recently had there. That is the very thing that this provision is intended to prevent.

Mr. McCOMAS. I am in entire sympathy with the purpose, but I want the experienced Senators on the committee to consider whether this provision would not be more flexible by providing that in such cases, if in doubt, the auditor shall apply to the Comptroller, and if the Comptroller says "Do not pay; I will not pass it," then the auditor shall have the absolute power to say "I will not countersign the check," and the check will not be paid without the countersigning of the auditor; but you use language here broader than you mean, and you get into trouble by making the auditor autocratic and by taking from the Commissioners their larger responsibility.

Mr. COCKRELL. There can be no possible danger from this provision.

Mr. McCOMAS. I think that what has been stated is possible to occur, but I shall not make any motion to amend the provision.

Mr. ALLISON. On behalf of the committee, I offer an amendment, to come in on page 3, after line 15, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, after line 15, it is proposed to insert:

That every person who, directly or indirectly, takes, receives, or agrees to receive any money, property, or other valuable consideration whatever from any person for giving, procuring, or aiding to give or procure any office, place, or promotion in office from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia or from any officer under them, and every person who, directly or indirectly, offers to give or gives any money, property, or other valuable consideration whatever for the procuring or aiding to procure any such office, place, or promotion in office, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof in the police court shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or imprisonment in the jail for not more thon twelve months, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer an amendment to come in on page 25, after line 10, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, after line 10, it is proposed to insert:

For Quincy street NW., from Twenty-ninth street to Pierce Mill road, opening, grading, and regulating, $5,000: Provided, That all the land necessary therefor is conveyed to the District of Columbia and dedicated to public use.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In consequence of the amendment just made, I move to change the total of the appropriations for "Construction of county roads," on page 25, line 11, to $272,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 26, after line 9, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 26, after line 9, it is proposed to insert:

MASSACHUSETTS AVENUE BRIDGE.

For raising the grade of roadway and the wing walls and culvert on line of Massachusetts avenue across Rock Creek, between Belmont road and the United States Naval Observatory grounds, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Those are all the amendments the committee have to offer.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

RECLAMATION OF ARID LANDS.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask that the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill known as the irrigation bill may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3057) appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States and Territories to the construction of irrigation works for the reclamation of arid lands; which were:

On page 3, lines 7 and 8, to strike out the words "at the time of" and insert the word "before."

On page 3, line 13, after the word "act," to insert:

And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, at or immediately prior to the time of beginning the surveys for any contemplated irrigation works, to withdraw from entry, except under the homestead laws, any public lands believed to be susceptible of irrigation from said works: Provided, That all lands entered and entries made under the homestead laws within areas so withdrawn during such withdrawal shall be subject to all the provisions, limitations, charges, terms, and conditions of this act; that said surveys shall be prosecuted diligently to completion, and upon the completion thereof, and of the necessary maps, plans, and estimates of cost, the Secretary of the Interior shall determine whether or not said project is practicable and advisable, and if determined to be impracticable or unadvisable he shall thereupon restore said lands to entry.

Strike out all of section 4 and insert:

SEC. 4. That upon the determination by the Secretary of the Interior that any irrigation project is practicable, he may cause to be let contracts for the construction of the same, in such portions or sections as it may be practicable to construct and complete as parts of the whole project, providing the necessary funds for such portions or sections are available in the reclamation fund, and thereupon he shall give public notice of the lands irrigable under such project, and limit of area per entry, which limit shall represent the acreage which, in the opinion of the Secretary, may be reasonably required for the support of a family upon the lands in question; also of the charges which shall be made per acre upon the said entries, and upon lands in private ownership which may be irrigated by the waters of the said irrigation project, and the number of annual installments, not exceeding ten, in which such charges shall be paid and the time when such payments shall commence. The said charges shall be determined with a view of returning to the reclamation fund the estimated cost of construction of the project, and shall be apportioned equitably: Provided, That in all construction work eight hours shall constitute a day's work, and no Mongolian labor shall be employed thereon.

On page 4, line 18, after the word "total," to insert "irrigable."

On page 4, line 25, after the word "landowner," to insert "and no such sale shall be made to any landowner unless he be an actual bona fide resident on such land, or occupant thereof residing in the neighborhood of said land."

On page 5, line 22, after the word "to," to insert "and the management and operation of."

On page 6, line 6, to strike out all after the word "purpose," down to and including the word "condemnation," in line 9.

On page 6, line 14, to strike out all after the word "Justice," down to and including the word "notwithstanding," in line 21.

On page 6, line 25, after the word "irrigation," to insert "or any vested right acquired thereunder."

On page 7, to strike out lines 1, 2, 3, down to and including the word "act," in line 4, and to insert:

And the Secretary of the Interior, in carrying out the provisions of this act, shall proceed in conformity with such laws, and nothing herein shall in any way affect any right of any State or of the Federal Government or of any landowner, appropriator, or user of water in, to, or from any interstate stream or the waters thereof.

To insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 9. That it is hereby declared to be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior in carrying out the provisions of this act, so far as the same may be practicable and subject to the existence of feasible irrigation projects, to expend the major portion of the funds arising from the sale of public lands within each State and Territory hereinbefore named for the benefit of arid and semiarid lands within the limits of such State or Territory: Provided, That the Secretary may temporarily use such portion of said funds for the benefit of arid or semiarid lands in any particular State or Territory hereinbefore named as he may deem advisable, but when so used the excess shall be restored to the fund as soon as practicable, to the end that ultimately, and in any event, within each ten-year period after the passage of this act, the expenditures for the benefit of the said States and Territories shall be equalized according to the proportions and subject to the conditions as to practicability and feasibility aforesaid.

And to change "section 9" to "section 10."

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I agree to that proposition, merely wishing to say in passing that there will undoubtedly be some corrective legislation necessary to follow. I should be glad to see some changes made now, but to propose them would necessitate a conference and delay, therefore I forbear. I consider the measure a good one as far as it goes, and I hope the motion of the Senator from North Dakota may prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Mr. HANNA. The senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] has been called out of the city, and I wish to announce that he will speak on the canal bill on Tuesday next.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I avail myself of the few moments that precede a more solemn exercise for the purpose of putting into the RECORD certain facts and tables which I desire that Senators shall have the opportunity of examining between now and Monday. I think it my duty as chairman of the committee to present these facts. I have not attempted from the beginning of this case to make a discussion of it. I have only attempted to present and to call the attention of the Senate to the facts, in order that they might see all the bearings of the entire situation; and in order to have an opportunity to get through with my brief statement I have reduced it to writing.

It is not denied by anyone, on the contrary, it is admitted by everybody, including the entire membership of the Isthmian Canal Commission, that in changing their previous recommendation of the Nicaragua route, twice repeated in their reports to the President of the United States, they did not change a fact in any statement or a figure in any calculation they had made in their former statements. Everything stood and still stands just as that Commission reported it, except the bid of the Panama Canal Company for the sale of its belongings and concession.

The only change that has been made in the situation was made by the Panama Canal Company. It offered to reduce the price of its property from $109,000,000 to $40,000,000, which reduction would make the cost of the Panama route $5,630,704 less than the Nicaragua route, according to the estimates of the Commission.

Whether we can save that sum by accepting the Panama Canal is the actual proposition, and the only one on which the Isthmian Canal Commission have based their change of recommendation in favor of Nicaragua to a recommendation in favor of the Panama route.

With them the entire question was the alleged saving of $5,630,704 in the construction of the canal, and the annual difference of $1,300,000 in the maintenance and operation of the canals.

If these two estimates are plainly incorrect on the face of their final report as to the value of the property offered to the United States by the Panama Canal Company, these commissioners are so discredited as to the value of their opinions on the financial features of the transaction that they can scarcely claim the immunity from question and criticism that is too often claimed and too little deserved by men who are called experts.

I am willing to concede that six members of that Commission are expert engineers and that they can with some degree of confidence state opinions, as experts, that rest on scientific calculation, or conjecture, or supposition, when facts fail to give them any actual support.

In the matter now before the Senate we are called upon to give a most indulgent license, almost a poetic license, to such opinions, in order to justify their conclusions that a canal can be safely located and operated with a dam at Bohio, on the Chagres River, and as to several other vital questions. But because these engineers may be able to create unknown facts and unprecedented results from such facts by a mental process, whether it is logic, without a major and minor proposition, or is a scientific dream, it does not follow that they can raise the actual value of the property, in spite of their own statements of facts and figures, by any expert engineering process. When they attempt that we must deny to them any expert superiority that overrides arithmetic and common sense.

I will assume that the value of the canal property that is offered for sale to the United States is not what it cost the Panama Canal Company to create it but the value of the work that is there to show for itself, measured by cubic yards, and estimated at a just and fair rate of cost, for excavation, haul, and embankment. The unit of prices adopted by the Commission for all earthwork remaining to be done settles the price of what has been done by the Panama Canal Company.

This is the only way that Congress can treat this cost price of the property so as to deal justly with taxpayers. To leave such a question to be decided by the caprice of engineers because they are experts in that science is to surrender the good of the country to their ideas of generous dealing, without reference to legal or moral justice. In this case it is a concession to the capricious injustice; that is, simply favoritism.

That Commission made the estimate of the earthwork done by the Panama Canal Company in its present condition at $22,895,028. Then they proceeded to add 20 per cent to that sum for contingencies, and they again add 10 per cent for contingencies on top of contingencies, which they designate as omissions. They charge the United States 30 per cent on their own estimates to cover the doubts, it seems, of their measurements, if any were in fact made.

They had plenty of time and money to make accurate measurements of the work for which we are to pay, but they made none.

If we had to pay as high a rate for their doubts and omissions about the Bohio Dam, the canal would cost a fabulous sum.

These contingencies and omissions run through the entire account on that celebrated page 103 of their report. They are even added "contingencies" to the cost of the railroad stock, which they estimate at par of its face value, and for the maps and records for which the United States is charged $2,000,000.

Then we are required to pay the Panama Canal Company $300,000 for a railroad diversion made for their convenience, when the railroad will have to be removed from the line from which it was so diverted, and that second removal is charged to us in the account at the sum of $1,267,500.

The second removal must be made so as to pass around what will be Lake Bohio, if it is ever created.

All this romance of arithmetical computation is called "an engineer's method of estimating the value of property" to be purchased for the United States.

It all looks to me more like an effort to pad the sum we are to pay the Panama Canal Company until it reaches the round sum of $40,000,000, of which a large part is only a benevolent contribution.

The generosity of the Commission in dealing with financial questions is not strictly entitled to be considered as the dealing of experts on questions of finance, I beg leave to say.

What is to be done in the distribution of the $2,000,000, with 10 per cent added for contingencies and omissions, that we are to pay for maps and records, I have no means of ascertaining. As to that we are left alone to conjecture. There is no schedule of the precious works of art.

Some of the engineer officers of the Panama Canal Company have been very active for two years past in lecturing through the larger cities of the United States in opposition to the Hepburn bill and in the severe disparagement of the Nicaragua route.

Several of those lectures have been sent me by mail, and I have even had the honor to receive calls from the gentleman who has led in these exercises, until recently, when that exalted branch of business has been turned over to some of the most distinguished members of the Isthmian Canal Commission.

Yesterday I found on my desk, in the Senate, the elegant and costly pamphlet I hold in my hand, which was written by that gentleman, and is entitled "Comparative Characteristics (construction and operation) of Panama and Nicaragua, prepared by Philippe Bunau-Varilla, formerly chief engineer of the Panama Canal Company."

I have seen nothing so elegant in letterpress and illustration, unless it is the edition of the report of the minority of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, placed upon our desks, which is handsome enough to be the repository of the argument of the first-class New York railroad lawyer whose opinion is added to that report to give it the weight of his approval. I refer to Mr. Cromwell, who, it is said, has saved many a wrecked railroad company through his great skill as professional osteopathist—a legal bonesetter for railroad companies—as to some of which he is credited with having broken their bones a second time, to the great increase of his reputation and his income.

The diagrams of lines and circles in this great work of the former engineer would be more convincing if he had told us by what process he ascertained their length and the degree of the curvature. If he can convince the Senate that the Isthmian Canal Commission has projected, approved, and recommended such a canal line as he has depicted in his illustrations he will totally discredit the entire Commission and drive us to the sea-level plan on which this great engineer-lecturer wasted so much of his time and genius while he was chief engineer of the Panama Canal Company.

He is also a stockholder in the company, and was finding great fault with M. Hutin as to his management. Hutin was too stiff and deliberate. Mr. Philippe Bunau-Varilla wanted small investment and quick returns.

If, added to his other labors, he had a part in engineering the slump in the price of the property from $109,000,000 to $40,000,000, of which $2,000,000 is for maps and literature, with 10 per cent added for contingencies and omissions, it would be sad to think that his masterpiece of deception should not be paid for out of the map and literature fund that we are invited to tax our people to pay by passing the Spooner substitute before the Senate.

But I suppose it is none of our business who is to get the $40,000,000 when we get rid of it. We appear to be out for a sharp bargain, and will be satisfied if we can get the property and escape responsibility for the application of the funds by the alleged trustee with whom we are dealing. It may be too late in this era of business principles to grow spasmodic over appearances, for it is now commonly said "that nothing succeeds like success."

But in comparing the cost of the two canals in dollars and omitting such questions as the value of numerous lives and the transfer of our commerce, by driving our sailing ships around Cape Horn and dedicating the Panama route, to the exclusive use of the great companies that own the great steamers, I will state, in calculations that I believe to be sound and correct, that the Panama Canal is by far the most costly route to the people. I will take the padded estimate of $40,000,000 without reduction and add to it the cost of concessions and of maintenance on both routes and the length of voyages by each route and the time consumed in passing through each canal, and I will take the period of one hundred years for the time to be covered by the calculation.

I take one hundred years as a period of calculation, because the proposed lease by Colombia is obligatory for that period. With this explanation, I will proceed to present the calculations of the cost of the respective canals on the basis I have just stated. It can not be changed except to the advantage of the Nicaragua route.

I now present tables showing the cost of construction of each canal, as estimated by the Isthmian Canal Commission:

First.—The cost of construction of each canal, as estimated by the Isthmian Canal Commission.

Estimated cost of Panama Canal, with $40,000,000 added	$184,233,358
Estimated cost of Nicaragua Canal	189,864,062
Difference in favor of Panama	5,630,704

Second.—The items of the computed value of the work done on the Panama Canal by the Panama Canal Company, showing the actual estimated value of each item and the percentage on each item allowed under the head of contingecnies.

Computed value of work done on Panama Canal	$21,020,386.00
Computed value of work done on Chagres diversion	178,186.00
Computed value of work done on Gatun diversion	1,396,456.00
Computed value of railroad diversion (4 miles)	300,000.00
Total	22,895,028.00
Contingencies, 20 per cent	4,579,005.00
Total	27,474,033.00
20 per cent of work done ($21,020,386)	4,204,077.20
20 per cent Chagres diversion	35,637.20
20 per cent Gatun diversion	279,291.20
20 per cent railroad diversion (4 miles)	60,000.00
Total for contingencies	4,579,005.60

Third.—Deduct the computed value of these items, without the percentage for contingencies, from $40,000,000, and it shows the balance as follows:

Estimated cost of Panama Canal	$40,000,000
Estimate of work done, and the Chagres, Gatun, and railroad diversions	22,895,028
Difference	17,104,972

Fourth.—When the amount is stated as above, compute the interest for one hundred years at 3 per cent, and the interest on $40,000,000 for one hundred years, and it shows the difference as follows:

Interest on $17,104,972 (difference), at 3 per cent, for 100 years	$51,314,916
Interest on $40,000,000, at 3 per cent, for 100 years	120,000,000
Difference	68,685,084

Fifth.—Computed interest at 3 per cent on the cost of the Panama Canal, as estimated by the Commission, for one hundred years and for eighty-six years.

Estimated cost of Panama Canal	$184,222,358
Interest, at 3 per cent, for 100 years	552,667,074
Interest, at 3 per cent, for 86 years	475,293,620

The eighty-six years dates from the period allowed as to each canal, as the time when they will be completed, being fourteen years.

Sixth.—Computed interest on the estimated cost of the Nicaragua Canal, at 3 per cent, for one hundred years and for eighty-six years.

Estimated cost of Nicaragua Canal	$189,864,062
Interest, at 3 per cent, for 100 years	569,592,186
Interest, at 3 per cent, for 86 years	489,849,206

Seventh.—Computed interest on $40,000,000 for one hundred years and on $7,000,000 for the same period.

Interest on $40,000,000 for 100 years, at 3 per cent	$120,000,000
Interest on $7,000,000 for 86 years, at 3 per cent	21,000,000

This $7,000,000 is the cash payment demanded by Colombia to cover the lease, at $500,000 per annum, during the fourteen years of construction.

Eighth.—Rental of the Panama Canal, at $500,000 per annum, for eighty-six years, and of the Nicaragua Canal, at $35,000 per annum, for one hundred years.

Rental of Panama Canal, at $500,000 per annum, for 86 years	$43,000,000
Rental of Nicaragua Canal, at $35,000 per annum, for 100 years	3,500,000
Total	46,500,000

Ninth.—Computed cost of maintenance for each route, as estimated by the Isthmian Canal Commission for eighty-six years, and the difference.

Estimated cost of maintenance, Nicaragua Canal, for 86 years	$283,800,000
Estimated cost of maintenance, Panama Canal, for 86 years	172,000,000
Difference	111,800,000

Tenth.—On the above basis, I state the cost of each route at the end of one hundred years:

NICARAGUA CANAL.

Estimated cost	$189,864,062
Interest, at 3 per cent, for 86 years	489,849,186
Rental, at $35,000 per annum, for 100 years	3,500,000
Maintenance for 86 years	283,800,000
Total	967,013,248

PANAMA CANAL.

Estimated cost	$184,233,358
Interest, at 3 per cent, for 86 years	475,293,620
Rental, at $500,000 per annum, for 86 years	43,000,000
Interest on $7,000,000 for 100 years	21,000,000
Maintenance for 86 years	172,000,000
	895,526,978
Interest, at 3 per cent, on $40,000,000 for 14 years	16,800,000
Total, Panama	912,326,978
Total, Nicaragua	967,013,248
Difference	54,686,270

Deduct from the above balance the following:

Railroad diversion	$300,000
Interest for 100 years	900,000
Contingencies, at 20 per cent	4,579,005
Interest for 100 years	13,737,015
Maps and records	2,000,000
Interest for 100 years	6,000,000
Total		$27,516,020
Difference in cost in favor of Panama		27,170,250

Calculating separately every item in all this great account with interest at 3 per cent, on both sides of the account, 3 per cent for Nicaragua and 3 per cent for Panama, it foots up at the bottom, at the end of a hundred years, upon that basis, $27,170,250, in favor of Panama. That is assuming that all of the statements and all of the calculations made by the Isthmian Canal Commission are proper.

To offset this sum in the dealings of one hundred years, the Nicaraguan route has the entire patronage of the sailing ships and the following items of advantage in the saving of time and money to all navigators that use that canal.

The foregoing figures are the same that the Isthmian Canal Commission has included in its estimate of the cost of the construction and maintenance of the canals and the price of the concessions, including interest, on the items of cost as above stated.

They show that at the end of one hundred years the difference of cost will be $54,686,270 in favor of Panama, if the estimates on page 103 of the report of the committee are adopted. If the railroad diversion, maps, and contingencies are omitted, the difference will be $27,170,250. If the interest is computed for one hundred years on the round sum of $40,000,000, that item will amount to $160,000,000. The actual sum stated by the Commission as the value of all the canal property and the multiplied contingencies is $39,956,836, not $40,000,000. The interest on this sum for one hundred years is $119,970,508, a difference of $11,072,656 in one hundred years. This loose calculation is a gift to the Panama Canal Company of this great sum, when the computation is extended over one hundred years, and reduces the difference in the cost of the routes to $9,109,594.

Mr. President, I have prepared certain tables which I will introduce at this point, which show one advantage in the tolls of the steamer trade alone in favor of Nicaragua that in one hundred years would wipe out this sum of $27,170,250 ten times over:

The average of the distance, by each route, for steamers between New York, Key West, and New Orleans, on the Atlantic side, and San Francisco, and ascertain, in miles, what the difference is.

	Miles.
Distance from New York to San Francisco via Panama	5,484
Distance from New York to San Francisco via Nicaragua	4,907
Distance from San Francisco to Key West via Nicaragua	3,835
Distance from San Francisco to Key West via Panama	4,395
Distance from San Francisco to New Orleans via Nicaragua	4,107
Distance from San Francisco to New Orleans via Panama	4,697
Distance greater, New Orleans to San Francisco via Panama	590
Distance greater, Key West to San Francisco via Panama	588
Distance greater, New York to San Francisco via Panama	587
Average greater via Panama	588

Average greater distance via Panama, in time, 2 days and 10 hours.

Average greater via Panama, in time, for round trip, 4 days and 20 hours, and 1,176 miles.

Estimating the average cost for 10-knot steamers at $150 per day, what is the difference in running expenses of a steamer on a round trip, going to San Francisco or the North Pacific?

Cost of 10-knot steamer from New York to San Francisco via Nicaragua, 20 days and 10 hours, at $150 per day	$3,062.50
Cost of same via Panama, 22 days and 20 hours, at $150 per day	3,425.00
Cost of round trip via Nicaragua	6,125.00
Cost of round trip via Panama	6,850.00
Difference	725.00

The difference in time between the Nicaragua and the Panama canals is equal to 9.5 per cent in favor of Nicaragua. So that in the same time there 100 steamers are passing through Panama 109.5 would pass through Nicaragua.

	Miles.
Distance from Brito to Panama	577
Distance from Greytown to Colon	543

Speed of vessels (steam and sailing) estimated at 10 knots per hour.

Estimating the average burden of steamers at 2,000 tons, how many steamships would have to pass through either canal to pay $8,000,000 in tolls, at $1 per ton, in one year?

The number of steamships averaging 2,000 tons each required to pass through either canal annually to pay $8,000,000 in tolls, at $1 per ton, equals 4,000 ships.

If 4,000 steamers are destined to North Pacific ports in one year, they will gain per trip $362.50 each in expense of passage via Nicaragua as against Panama, which would equal $1,460,000.

If 4,000 steamers sailing from New York to the west coast of South America via Nicaragua will save a distance of 543 miles, the difference between Greytown and Colon, equal to two days and six hours, at $150 per day, this will be $337.50 additional expense per ship; which will, for 4,000 ships, equal $1,350,000. This is the amount the Commission estimates as annually greater for maintenance of the Nicaragua than the Panama Canal.

A sailing ship of 1,000 tons burden from New York to San Francisco, assuming the same speed to be made (10 knots per hour) and the sailing directions of the Hydrographic Office to be observed:

From San Francisco to New York via Panama (allowing 10 days delay in the doldrums), 32 days and 20 hours, at $75 per day	$2,462.50
The same estimate via Nicaragua	1,531.25
Difference in favor of Nicaragua	961.25
Difference on 8,000 ships per year of 1,000 tons each	7,690,000.00

The same vessels bound for the western coast of South America, allowing the same number of days for both in the doldrums, via Nicaragua, two days and six hours, at $75 per day, saving by reason of difference in distance from Greytown to Colon of $168.75.

Now, it is here clearly shown that while 100 vessels are passing through the Nicaragua Canal, in the same time 90 would pass through the Panama Canal on a voyage from New York, Key West, or New Orleans to San Francisco as the initial and destined points. On steamers of 2,000 tons each this would show a difference of 20,000 tons, which, at $1 per ton, will equal $20,000 in favor of Nicaragua tolls over the Panama.

Again, it shows that the Panama could not accommodate more than two or three vessels on the canal at the same time. Calling the Nicaragua 183 miles, it would appear safe for 20 vessels to be on the canal at the same time. The opportunity for berth room in Lake Nicaragua is an immense advantage in passing a fleet through that canal.

Vessels via Panama would be obliged to wait at both ends of the canal for their chance to get through, while the Nicaragua route would be able to hold all ships that would be liable to want passage at one time, even if it were a great fleet of war ships. These conditions, in connection with the fact that Nicaragua is farther east and north (and seven-tenths of commerce will be north and not south of Nicaragua), the econmics in saving of time and money to the carrier is a consideration of vital importance.

So, on the calculations I have made, with perfect fairness and perfect correctness I am sure, based upon the estimates of the Isthmian Canal Commission, the supposed advantage in favor of the Panama route is wiped out by various items of profit that we will acquire by sailing ships going through the Nicaragua route and also by the time required between San Francisco and New Orleans, Key West, or New York, which three points indicate the average distance which would be sailed by a steamer or by a sailing ship between the coast of the Atlantic and the coast of the Pacific.

I do not care now, Mr. President, to go further into this subject than to reproduce a statement which I made at a former day of this session on the subject of the maintenance of the canal. There is a remarkable history, which I have stated in what I am about to put into the RECORD, about the ascertainment of the cost of maintenance. The Commission seem to have had a great struggle with themselves about it and got into such confusion, such entanglement, that they finally refused to report any items that comprised the estimate. They have made this report here, with all this vast array of appendixes, without presenting to Congress, and to the engineers of the world, the items upon which they base this extravagant and utterly unsupported charge for the maintenance of both canals.

How did that happen? It happened by the Commission adopting the wholly extravagant idea that they would organize for this canal when it was built and while it was being built a form of government which would be quite sufficient for a State, and much larger, very much larger, in its expenses than the State of Alabama, or, I believe, any other State, except some of those States like Illinois or Pennsylvania or New York or Massachusetts, that have large cities located within their boundaries.

This top-heavy grandeur in their estimates, I am glad to say, does not fall within the rules that substitute expert opinions for facts and rational conclusions in business matters.

Congress can not entertain the thought that an isthmian canal is to be run at a cost that would be extravagant for a European principality. But there seems to be nothing that is too grand or romantic for engineers in the way of spending public money.

They began this grand plan by creating a supervisory commission to reside in Washington City, to consist of seven members and to have salaries of $10,000 a year each. They are not required to visit the canal at all, but are to be located here for the purpose of making appointments to offices in the canal work and for the purpose of revising or supervising what is being done on the canal through reports made to them by whom? By the president of the canal, who is to have for his cabinet a number of officers, engineers, medical officers, lawyers, and navigators, all of whom are to receive very extravagant allowances. When they come to foot it up, it is a very great sum.

How do they seem to have distributed that between the two canals? They give no rule. They give us no sort of guide for the distribution of it, but I can conceive of no other way in which they could have made the distribution except by the mileage of the canal. Inasmuch as it is 183 miles across at Nicaragua and 47 or 49 miles across at Panama, the difference in cost of maintenance was estimated and regulated, it seems to me, by that one single fact. But I want to know why it is, and I want the Senate to answer the question when we get through this debate and come to voting, that the great Commission could not afford to make anything but a rough, round estimate for which they gave never one single item on which their judgment was based.

This is the point where the injustice to Nicaragua is inflicted in the calculations of the Isthmian Canal Commission. This is even worse than the padding out of the $40,000,000 to be paid to the Panama Canal Company for contingencies mounted upon contingencies like compound interest; and for literature and maps like those that Monsieur Bucan-Varilla has so kindly laid upon our desks to prove the utter incompetency of the Isthmian Canal Commission.

When we look at the Great Soo Canal, the Kiel Canal, the Manchester Canal, and the Suez Canal, and when we come to compare the cost of maintenance of those diffenent canals with the cost they have estimated here, we find they conduct those canals for one-third of the money that is charged here. It is the evident purpose of the Isthmian Canal Commission to make a great government for the canal, in which millions and millions of the money of the people of the United States shall be spent, instead of going to work like business men and ascertaining what would be a reasonable cost for the maintenance of the canal.

Now, I will ask leave to insert in my remarks what I have heretofore said to the Senate on the same subject, and I do it because I do not wish to repeat the tables I gave on that occasion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the matter will be printed in the RECORD. (See Appendix.)

APPENDIX.

[From Mr. Morgan's speech of April 17, 1902.]

THE COST OF MAINTENANCE AND OPERATION OF THE CANALS.

I will allude to the expenses charged to the respective routes for operating expenses and the maintenance of way, to add only a few observations that need to be made.

Under this head there are no items given in the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission as to which a computation can be made in order to test the accuracy of their estimates, or the cost of maintaining and operating any other canal as an approximate criterion.

The cost of maintenance, per mile, of the Suez Canal is $13,000; of the Kiel Canal, $8,600, and of the St. Marys Canal from $46,000 to $60,000 per mile.

The St. Marys Canal is only 1½ miles long and has all the advantages of concentration. At the rate of $1 per ton, its income during the eight months it is open during the year would be more than $30,000,000. It is the force employed in handling the traffic in the open months that costs so heavily.

The basis of these estimates was discussed by the Commission, but it was not given in their final report, because it was not agreed upon. It was produced by Colonel Ernst, on his examination, and is found in his deposition on pages 687 to 698 of the hearings.

The scheme of government is elaborate, even grand, and is quite ample in officials and salaries for the government of a commonwealth. It consists of a supreme board of control, at Washington, and an engineering department, A, with a governor at a salary of $15,000, and the other salaries are correspondingly high for five other departments.

The risk of life in the climate of Panama may excuse this extravagance for that canal, but it is without justification for Nicaragua. The following summary of these items will show the great magnitude of this plan:

THE SALARIES OF FIVE MEMBERS OF THE SUPREME BOARD OF CONTROL AND THEIR SUBORDINATES IS NOT GIVEN.

Grand total	3,350,000	Grand total	2,024,174

The law department of Panama is put at $15,300, for providing the legal regimen for 35,000 resident people, while it is put at $18,700 at Nicaragua, where not more than 2,000 people now reside.

The police department is put at $251,100 at Panama, where there are 35,000 unruly people to control, and at $508,300 at Nicaragua, to control a scattered population of 2,000, quite orderly and peaceable people.

The finance department is put at $27,700 at Nicaragua and $27,300 at Panama. The amount of money to be received in tolls is supposed to be the cause of this discrimination against Nicaragua of $400 of the expenses.

The medical department is made to cost $125,000 at Nicaragua, in a healthy country, and 13 medical officers, 6 stewards, 36 nurses, and 18 laborers are provided, while the total cost of the medical department at Panama is $104,860, with 7 medical officers, 3 stewards, 12 nurses, and 6 laborers at emergency hospitals, and 5 medical officers, 2 stewards, 20 nurses, and 10 laborers at the regular hospital. The difference of $20,620 per annum is made in favor of Panama, where the pestilential character of that region is described as "fever hole" by General Alexander, and is known of all men to be a region where the yellow fever and chagres fever have their habitat, from which they are never absent. It is so in each of the departments of this proposed government, which seems to have been created to form a basis for the calculation of maintaining an isthmian canal and then retired from observation for future use.

THIS STATELY PROGRAMME FOR WORKING A CANAL AS IF IT WAS A KINGDOM IS RESPONSIBLE FOR THESE TREMENDOUS ESTIMATES OF EXPENSES.

It is in this programme that the idea had its origin that $2,024,174 was required for maintenance and operation of the canal at Panama and that $3,350,822 is required for the canal at Nicaragua. The difference of $1,326,664 is ample to operate either canal, if we accept the experience of the Suez Canal, the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, or any other canal between great bodies of water.

It is impossible to know or safely to conjecture by what rule or principle the Isthmian Canal Commission fixed the charges of maintenance and operation of the canal at Nicaragua or compared them with those of the Panama Canal. For engineering, police, sanitation, and general contingencies their estimate of the cost of construction of the canal is $31,644,010. This evidently includes all the plant that is needed for these purposes, and for a canal completed and equipped. Then they add other sums for plant, for the maintenance of all the canal purposes, for keeping the canal in good order, and for vessels and other appliances needed for such service.

The contingencies charged to the Nicaragua Canal are $558,470 in this plan of government, and those charged to the Panama Canal are $337,362, a difference of $221,118 annually, while the steam tugs, inspection steamers, dredges, pile drivers, tugs, scows, pilot boats, naphtha launches, canoes, and saddle horses, which in their nature can not be reasonably expected to be resupplied each year, are charged at full cost, which is very great, for each year, as if they would all disappear after a single year of service.

These estimates, which are far too extravagant and are so loosely made, and these salaries and pay rolls, which are very expensive, account in great part for the charge of $3,350,822 to the Nicaragua Canal for maintenance and operation, when the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, in December, 1900, said in an official bulletin of that date:

> There are no locks on the Suez Canal, but the channel is through drifting sand for a great part of its length. The entrance to the harbor of Port Said, on the Mediterranean, intercepts the drift of sand discharged from the Nile and carried along the coast by the easterly current. The navigation in which steamships can make full speed if they choose is longer than the entire length of the Suez Canal. The line of canalization on land at Nicaragua is 53.50 miles, only about half that of the Suez Canal, and only 6 miles longer than the Panama Canal, all of which is artificial canal.
> Suez has 100 miles of navigation through an artificial channel, and Panama has 47 miles, while Nicaragua has 63 miles of artificial channel and 120 miles of river and lake navigation in which there are no locks. On this state of facts it is impossible that any reason can be stated why it should require $18,310 per mile to maintain 183 miles of canal, of which only 63 miles is of actual canalization, when the cost per mile of the Suez Canal is $13,000, and that canal is dug entirely through the desert sands, which blow into it and make constant dredging necessary to keep it open.

That is the official statement of your Government, which knocks the estimate of the canal commissioners into dust. Nobody is responsible for that but your Government.

It is beyond all reason and experience that the more than 100 miles of deep water on the route of the Nicaragua Canal, where there is no lock and where a dredge will never be used, should be charged annually with $1,741,400 for cost of maintenance and operation. It is on this absurd conjecture that this erroneous calculation has been made. When this sum of $1,741,400 is subtracted from the estimate of $3,350,822, made by the commissioners, it still leaves $1,611,422 to be applied to maintenance and operation, which is still more than is expended annually on the Suez Canal for those purposes by the sum of $311,422, which is more than the estimates of the Isthmian Canal Commission for operating and taking care of the locks, with 20 per cent added for contingencies.

The uncertainty of the situation as to the cost of maintenance and operation of the canal, created by this effort to fabricate a great and expensive system for its government and control, has introduced into this subject an element of doubt and confusion of a serious character.

It would not have existed if the commissioners, at the time they made this report, had been confronted with the $40,000,000 proposition of the Panama Canal Company. They then had no doubt that this company was acting sincerely in the statement that $109,000,000 was the sum, below which, they would not sell the ditch, the maps, and the railroad stock, with the right, without objection from them, to purchase new concessions from Colombia; and they had no special reasons for closely estimating the cost of maintaining and operating the canal, as to which there must always be a margin of doubt.

The effort was made, on a plan of great amplitude, to institute a very costly government for the canal, but it failed in committee, and was not sent to the President with their report, and it is this abortive scheme that is now presented as the estimate of great engineers, carefully made, as to the difference of the cost of maintenance and operation as between the two routes.

The number and salaries of the official corps, the cost of the plant, to be renewed annually, and the contingencies, have no actual relation to the experience of governments in respect of other canals. They are arbitrary suggestions, and are not calculations based on facts that are even alluded to as supporting the plan.

The following statements in the deposition of Colonel Ernst sufficiently explain the situation:

> The CHAIRMAN. About what is the population of Panama?
> Colonel ERNST. About 20,000, I think.
> The CHAIRMAN. And about how much in Colon?
> Colonel ERNST. About five or six thousand.
> The CHAIRMAN. Is there any considerable number of French citizens or people located in Panama or Colon permanently?
> Colonel ERNST. Well, I fancy not. Of course, most of the people that we saw were French. They were the officers of the canal company, but I do not think there are many outside of those officials.
> The CHAIRMAN. Are there many French residents in that part of the country, in those cities?
> Colonel ERNST. I did not see any.
> The CHAIRMAN. In the sanitation that is necessary on the Panama route, would you feel that it was safe without including the city of Panama and the city of Colon?
> Colonel ERNST. No; I can not say that I think it would be safe.

The CHAIRMAN. How far is the city of Panama from the line of the canal as it is dredged from the bay there?

Colonel ERNST. It is about 3 miles.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be included in the canal limits, if they were 3 miles wide?

Colonel ERNST. I certainly would prefer that they should be included.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you not think that it was absolutely necessary to include it in order to preserve the sanitation, or whatever results might come from sanitation, on the Panama route?

Colonel ERNST. I think the result would undoubtedly be better with it. It is a question of degree. You certainly could not have the same sanitary state there without that city as you can with it.

The CHAIRMAN. That would apply equally well to Colon?

Colonel ERNST. Yes; but Colon is nearly all owned by the Panama Railroad Company, and if you buy that you buy the city.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I think that is a legal question. Suppose, however, that we bought it and got the title to all the property that had passed through the hands of the railroad company and under concessions from Colombia, it would be still necessary to have the control of it in order to accomplish this sanitary purpose?

Colonel ERNST. I think so.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, it would be also necessary to have the control of it for police purposes?

Colonel ERNST. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What sort of a population is there at Colon and at Panama?

Colonel ERNST. Well, I could not say that it was a very high order of population. I did not come into very close personal contact with it. I would say, however, that they were a rather low order of people, a great many of them. Of course there are some respectable people there.

The CHAIRMAN. A very mixed population?

Colonel ERNST. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They are a turbulent people, too, are they not?

Colonel ERNST. I would say they are; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Hard to manage?

Colonel ERNST. They are fighting and quarreling all the time; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And they are insurrectionary?

Colonel ERNST. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We have had several occasions when we have had to send ships of war down there with marines aboard in order to preserve the peace and save the property that the French people have got on that Isthmus, and also to protect and guarantee the sovereignty of the Republic of Colombia over the State of Panama. That is in our treaty.

Colonel ERNST. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, in making up your estimate of the maintenance of the Panama Canal, the current expenses of maintenance and preservation and protection, etc., I suppose you took all of those elements into consideration?

Colonel ERNST. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you include the sanitation and the police control of the city of Panama, with 20,000 inhabitants?

Colonel ERNST. We did not in terms. The way we did that was to draw up an organization for the management of the canal, a separate board of control here in this country consisting of 5 members, a governor on the Isthmus with his staff and office, and then provide for 6 departments, the engineering department, with all its various assistants and appliances and the material required; the transit department, having charge of the regulation of dues and the transit and management of all pilots and all that sort of thing, and the light-houses; the medical department, charged with the quarantine regulations, the general hospitals, and the hospital supplies, the subordinate hospitals, and sanitary inspection; the police department, and a law department, and a finance department.

We had all those worked out in detail, and the medical department was charged mainly with the hospitals and subhospitals and the sanitary inspection and the quarantine service. Now, we allowed a force necessary for that, without taking into account any great city.

The CHAIRMAN. You took into account the men who were connected with the operation of the canal?

Colonel ERNST. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And the railroad?

Colonel ERNST. And the railroad. The general hospitals, which would be some little way off, probably, from the canal.

The CHAIRMAN. But you made your estimate on the number of men that would probably be employed in the navigation and management of the canal and railroad?

Colonel ERNST. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not include in it the citizenship of these cities?

Colonel ERNST. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Could you name here the appendix that contains those estimates? We have been very much at a loss to find out about them.

Colonel ERNST. We did not publish those, because it is purely theoretical; we felt that we could not defend every estimate of it. We felt that there were errors both ways. You can conceive of the difficulty of getting up of such an organization at a desk for a great work like that, which must actually be tested and corrected in practice. I mean it must be adjusted. There are many of those items that we felt would err, some on one side and some on the other, and we thought that they would correct each other; but doing it the same for both lines we thought it was a fair comparison.

The CHAIRMAN. You made a comparison in your own minds, based upon facts that you yourselves had observed on the line or had learned from other sources, but you did not make up an itemized statement and balance sheet between the cost of maintenance on the one route and the other?

Colonel ERNST. Oh, yes; we went through this organization for both canals. Of course the Nicaragua Canal had the same general control. The governing board in this country would be the same as for the Panama and also the governor and his staff on the Isthmus would be the same and the chiefs of these departments would all be the same. Now, when it came to the number of posts you would have to have for police force, there would be more on the Nicaraguan than on the Panama. We would have to have more engineering divisions.

The CHAIRMAN. What I wanted to get at is whether the items were put down on the list.

Colonel ERNST. Oh, I have got them all, and I would be very glad to show them to you. I have not got them here to-day, but I can bring them if you wish to see them.

The CHAIRMAN. They were not published?

Colonel ERNST. No.

The CHAIRMAN. I would be very glad if you will furnish us with them, because we have had a great difficulty in getting at the items of the estimate.

Colonel ERNST. It is one of those things that we are perfectly aware is open to attack, because they are approximations, but they are identical for the two lines.

The CHAIRMAN. You will furnish them to us?

Colonel ERNST. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Then I will not go any further into that question.

Additional statement of Col. Oswald H. Ernst:

The CHAIRMAN. Did you get the paper I referred to?

Colonel ERNST. Yes; here it is.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like very much to have this go into the record. It may become very important if the canal should be built.

Colonel ERNST. It is very carefully gotten up. The reason we did not publish it is because there are undoubtedly errors in it. Estimates are too high in some respects and too low in others. We thought they would correct each other. The comparison, however, is a fair one. It is the same for both canals. It is a study to which we devoted a good many weeks. It is as follows:

TENTATIVE ORGANIZATION FOR THE MAINTENANCE AND OPERATION OF THE CANALS.

I. NICARAGUA CANAL.

Supreme control to rest in a board of five members, located in Washington. The duties of the board will be:

1. To make regulations for the government of the canal, including the tariff of charges, navigation rules, police and sanitary rules, and, in short, all rules required for the operation and maintenance of the canal.

2. To make or approve all appointments, the salary of which equals or exceeds $100 per month.

3. To make or approve all contracts.

4. To audit all money accounts before transmitting them to the Treasury Department.

The annual expenses of the board may be placed at $100,000.

Organization on the Isthmus.—The general control to be vested in a governor, having his headquarters at Greytown, where the general offices will be located.

The administration will be divided among six departments, viz:

A. Engineer department, charged with all the maintenance and improvement of the canal, including the repair shops and storehouses, and the repairs of public buildings; also with the location and sale or rental of lands.

B. Transit department, charged with the navigation of the canal, the assessment of dues, the service of the ports, including light-houses, and the operation of telegraph and telephone lines.

C. Medical department, charged with the hospital and other medical service, including port, quarantine, and sanitary inspection service.

D. Finance department, charged with the collection of dues, payment of salaries, and management of the funds.

E. Law department, charged with the supervision of such minor courts as may be established and with all legal matters.

F. Police department, charged with the preservation of order and with the management of the armed force required for that purpose.

The governor.—The governor will issue orders to the heads of departments, will make reports to the board of control, and conduct all correspondence with that board, and will make frequent inspection of all parts of the canal. Attached to his office will be a secretary, two clerks, two messengers, and one small inspection steamer, the latter to be available for other officials when not required by the governor.

Annual expense of governor's office.

Salaries:
Governor	$15,000
Secretary	5,000
Clerks, 2 at $1,500	3,000
Messengers, 2 at $400	800
Inspection steamer	15,000
Office supplies	500
Total	39,300

A board of five members in Washington, for the government of the Philippine Islands, with salaries corresponding with those of the Isthmian Canal Commission of $60,000 a month, would be quite as safe and useful as this proposed board would be for the government of an isthmian canal and probably more expeditious in getting through with their work.

No salaries are named for this supreme board of control, and the only precedent we have on that point is that it would cost not less than $60,000 each year.

The estimated contingencies of $558,470 for the Nicaragua route and $337,362 for the Panama route, in all $895,832, included in the cost of this plan of canal government, would safely cover the estimate of $60,000 and provide living salaries for the five members of the board of supreme control, and still leave enough to pay the salary of the governor, at $15,000 per annum, and his official staff, and for a steamer for their use, which is summed up at $39,300 per annum. The total annual expense of the supreme board of control and of the governor's executive department is not to be less than $783,000 in the plan proposed for the government of the canal. This plan, although it was not adopted, is the actual basis of computation of the cost of the maintenance and operation of this canal.

Yet it is no hazardous venture to assert that, with a good, honest, industrious, and reliable engineer at the head of the enterprise, this array of salaried officials could be dispensed with far more safely than they could be employed in the conduct of the work.

It has required the estimates that were made for this novel, extravagant, and dangerous plan of canal government to support the estimates of the Commission for the maintenance and operation of these canals, which have no support in the actual experience of any other canal in the world.

An argument against the Nicaragua Canal based on such estimates has no just support in fact and no sanction in the history of any other canal.

I beg the attention of Senators to a careful consideration of these estimates and the failure of the Isthmian Canal Commission to furnish, in their report, even the data on which they are based. It is in these estimates and in the inflation of the value of the property they advise us to buy from the Panama Canal Company that is alone to be found their last report in favor of Panama after they made two reports against and a solemn statement to a committee of the Senate of the same import.

SPANISH WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. TILLMAN. If there is nothing else pressing at the moment, I should like to have unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 3641) for the allowance of certain claims for property taken for military purposes within the United States during the war with Spain, reported by the Secretary of War in accordance with the requirements of an item contained in the sundry civil appropriation act approved June 6, 1900, authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to investigate just claims against the United States for private property taken and used in the military service within the limits of the United States, etc. It is an omnibus claims bill in which a good many citizens of my State are interested. The chairman of the committee, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], was going to call it up, but he left the Chamber temporarily. I should like to ask unanimous consent to call it up and have it passed. I do not think there is any objection to it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Claims was, under the head of "Florida," on page 3, after line 2, to insert:

To J. H. May, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 14, before the word "seventeen," to strike out the name "Montgomerty" and insert "Montgomery;" so as to make the clause read:

To J. R. Montgomery, $17.50.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 20, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eighty-five" and insert "one hundred and twenty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

To J. W. Golden, $125.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 7, to insert:

To S. Seisel, $10.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Iowa," page 5, after line 19, to insert:

To George Spaulding, $25.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 20, to insert:

To Mrs. S. Clark, $162.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 15, before the name "Williams," to strike out the letter "T" and insert "F;" so as to make the clause read:

To James F. Williams, $90.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 10, before the word "three," to strike out the name "Benzier" and insert "Brenizer;" so as to make the clause read:

To F. L. Brenizer, $300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 14, before the word "cents" to strike out "five" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

To Belle V. Brant, $6.50.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if there is a claim in it in favor of W. A. Huff, of Macon, Ga.

Mr. WARREN. There are some 300 claims embraced in the bill, and I should have to refer to the bill to ascertain.

Mr. CLAY. I have just received a telegram stating that there was a claim of that kind in the bill, and asking me to have it stricken out.

Mr. WARREN. The clerks can look at the claims under the headline of "Georgia." I will say, while the clerks are searching for it, that this bill is composed alone of such claims as have been certified here from a board in the War Department, as provided by law.

Mr. CLAY. I understand; but Mr. Huff, who would be the beneficiary, has telegraphed me requesting that the item be stricken from the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Georgia repeat the name?

Mr. CLAY. W. A. Huff.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read what he finds on the subject.

The Secretary read as follows:

To W. A. Huff, $304.

Mr. CLAY. If it is in order, I move to strike out that item.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CONSIDERATION OF UNOBJECTED PENSION BILLS, ETC.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I now renew my request that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected pension cases and bills to correct military records.

Mr. HOAR. For what length of time does the Senator ask that such bills shall be considered?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a notice given for a special purpose at 4 o'clock.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; notice for a special purpose has been given at 4 o'clock. I thought it very likely that it would take pretty nearly all of the time up to that hour.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; I shall not object to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire, but I should like to say that the anti-injunction bill, so called, a measure which has been very carefully considered by the Committee on the Judiciary, and which has been the subject of a good deal of interest in many parts of the country, should at some time be considered. I should have called it up this afternoon if I could have obtained the floor before the Senator from New Hampshire did, had the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], who has taken some interest in it on the committee, been present. I therefore simply give notice now, without objecting to the request of my honorable friend, that I shall take some convenient time to ask the Senate to consider it.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not yet obtained consent.

Mr. CULBERSON. With reference to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire, I hope he will make the request so as to apply to the entire Calendar and not confine it to pension and war-record cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected pension cases and bills to correct military records. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota if the bill he desires to call up does not occasion debate.

A. M. DARLING, ADMINISTRATOR.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 587) for the relief of A. M. Darling, administrator. It will not take any time; it is a very short bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay $1,974 in full to A. M. Darling, of Douglas County, Minn., for depredations committed on the property of the late Andreas Darling, in 1862, by the Sioux Indians, of Minnesota, which amount shall be charged against and deducted from the forfeited annuities of said Indians now held by the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRISCILLA R. BURNS.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to call up a bill which was partly considered the other day. I think it was read. It is Senate bill 4517, and it is early on the Calendar.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 4517) for the relief of Priscilla R. Burns; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay $7,987 to Priscilla R. Burns, widow of the late Gen. William W. Burns, deceased, in full payment of the balance due him for royalty on 3,195 tents used by the United States Government.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KATIE A. NOLAN.

Mr. GALLINGER. I promised to yield to the Senator from Texas for a bill which he says will not occasion debate.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4308) for the relief of Katie A. Nolan.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to Katie A. Nolan, of San Antonio, Tex., $800, in full of the difference of pay due to her as a stamp clerk at the post-office at San Antonio, Tex., between the salary actually received by her and the amount of salary to which she was entitled by law from July 1, 1889, to July 1, 1893.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first pension bill on the Calendar will be proceeded with.

WILLIAM F. BOWDEN.

The bill (H. R. 13178) granting a pension to William F. Bowden was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of William F. Bowden, late of Company K, Fourth Regiment Virginia Volunteer Infantry, war with Spain, and to pay him a pension of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FREDERICK W. WILLEY, ALIAS WILLIAM F. WILLEY.

The bill (S. 5944) granting an increase of pension to Frederick W. Willey, alias William F. Willey, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Frederick W. Willey, alias William F. Willey, late of United States Navy, and to pay him a pension of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS H. DEVITT.

The bill (H. R. 10794) granting a pension to Thomas H. Devitt was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Thomas H. Devitt, the helpless and dependent son of Thomas Devitt, late of Company D, One hundred and eighty-seventh Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JULIA B. SHURTLEFF.

The bill (H. R. 13063) granting an increase of pension to Julia B. Shurtleff was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Julia B. Shurtleff, widow of Edward S. Shurtleff, late acting master, United States Navy, and to pay her a pension of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELLA B. S. MANNIX.

The bill (H. R. 13683) granting an increase of pension to Ella B. S. Mannix was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Ella B. S. Mannix, widow of Daniel Pratt Mannix, late captain, United States Marine Corps, and to pay her a pension of $30 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FLORIAN V. SIMS.

The bill (H. R. 5146) granting an increase of pension to Florian V. Sims was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Florian V. Sims, widow of Alexander Sims, late of Company G, Third Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month, and $2 per month additional on account of the minor child of the soldier until such child shall have arrived at the age of 16 years, in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MOSES S. CURTIS.

The bill (H. R. 8476) granting an increase of pension to Moses S. Curtis was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Moses S. Curtis, late of Company E, Fourteenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $14 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES E. MILLER.

The bill (H. R. 2615) granting an increase of pension to Charles E. Miller was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Charles E. Miller, late of Company F, Fourth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EMMA L. FERRIER.

The bill (S. 3180) granting a pension to Emma L. Ferrier was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE STOKES.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the resolutions from the House of Representatives in memory of Dr. STOKES, late a member of that body, may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 26, 1902.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. J. WILLIAM STOKES, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a distinguished public servant, the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk be instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolutions submitted by the Senator from South Carolina will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. J. WILLIAM STOKES, late a Representative from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended in order that fitting tributes may be paid to the memory of the deceased.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect to his memory the Senate, at the conclusion of these ceremonies, do adjourn.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the Senate and the House of Representatives, forming as they do component parts of the legislative branch of the Government, work together in all things where the making of laws is concerned. This intimate relationship necessarily brings the members of the two bodies into close and friendly contact and many lasting friendships have had their origin in a committee room of the Capitol.

Therefore it is that the custom has grown up for both Houses to take cognizance of the death of a member of either and to pay due respect to the memory of a dead comrade. The feeling is somewhat akin to that of attending the funeral of a fellow-soldier who has died. His immediate associates attend the last sad rites, but the members of the other companies also attend the funeral, and so when a Senator dies the House takes part on a subsequent day in paying respect to his memory, just as the Senate performs the same duty in regard to a dead Representative.

The Senate pauses in its labors to-day out of respect to a member of the lower House—a man not known to very many Senators, but one whose character and worth were most highly appreciated by those of us who were acquainted with him. J. WILLIAM STOKES, a citizen of South Carolina, and a member of Congress for six years preceding his death, was called to his long rest on 6th day of July, 1901. He was a member-elect to the present Congress, and had served the people of his district with distinguished ability and zeal during his Congressional career.

The facts of his personal and political history have already been set forth in the eulogy pronunced by Mr. A. F. LEVER, his successor in the House, on the 26th of April last, and they will appear in the memorial volume, and as the rehearsal of that record in this presence would be but a repetition, I shall not dwell upon it. I prefer to speak of my dead friend rather from the point of view of a colaborer in a common field and to give some estimate of his character as a man than deal with the subject from the standpoint of the biographer. Owing to the fact that he had left South Carolina immediately after his graduation from the Washington and Lee University, of Virginia, and remained away, following his chosen profession as a teacher, until 1889, I had no knowledge of him in his earlier manhood.

I shall always recollect the first time I met him. It was at the "March convention" of the farmers' movement in the city of Columbia in 1890. He was on the committee to draft a platform, and his thorough insight into all the public questions then agitating the people of South Carolina and his earnest, zealous purpose to present those issues in the best light and frame the demands for reform which were pulsating in the hearts of our people, so as to minimize opportunities for attack and assure so far as practicable the support of all those in sympathy with our purpose, made him a marked member of the convention.

South Carolinians ordinarily are very jealous of outsiders, and Dr. STOKES's long absence from the State in the case of some men would have made it impossible that he should have exerted any influence; but his modesty and the clearness and force with which he presented his ideas and argued any moot question, silenced any jealous mutterings, and from the first he became a leader in the movement in South Carolina to reform the State government just as he was soon after among the most prominent men in the Alliance movement in the State, which had for its purpose the securing of reforms in the National Government.

While he was not an eloquent speaker, he was forceful and logical, and his arguments always carried with them weight, if not conviction. Though he was my junior by seven years, his temperament was so calm and judicial that I always listened to his opinions with deference, and very rarely differed with him on public questions. From the first day we met in March, 1890, to the day of his death there was cooperation growing into the warmest friendship and closest political alliance. In looking back now over those years of arduous labor performed together, I recollect not one single incident which produced bitterness or distrust; and after our entrance upon the national arena, he in the other end of the Capitol and I in this, we were thrown together much more intimately than had been possible previously, and the admiration which his clear and forceful mind had excited was succeeded by most cordial and warm friendship. The better he was known the more he was loved and respected.

It was in this intimate association that I came to understand and appreciate the higher and nobler side of the man—not but what all of his attributes were high and noble, but I allude more particularly to his home life and to his chivalrous and almost idolatrous attachment to the noble woman who had won his love. It was in the home and in the company of his wife that Dr. STOKES shone in his most admirable light. Having no children of his own, he was always stealing the heart of some child with whom he came in contact, and my own little ones learned to love him and to run to meet him on his frequent visits with that ardor and abandonment of joy which a child alone knows how to exhibit.

In the art of winning his way to the hearts of children he was not surpassed by any man I have ever known, and no student of human nature will ask any higher tribute to his character. Children do not love those who are selfish and mean; and, guileless themselves, they are not easily deceived in their estimate of men and women. I would sooner trust the intuition and instincts of a child than depend on the judgment of a grown person where character and goodness are in question.

A man of the most refined manners, Dr. STOKES was a favorite with all those who came to know him intimately; so while the men respected him for his manliness of principle and high character, the women were his admiring friends because of his chivalry and deference to their sex, while the children loved him for his kindliness and sympathetic interest in all of their little affairs.

It would be improper to invade the sacred precincts of his desolate home, but the devotion which bound him to his wife, the romantic idealized love, so to speak, with which he regarded her, made the separation of those two who were certainly "one twain," the more heartrending. I can not offer any consolation to that widowed heart that will assuage its longing, but it would not be improper, perhaps, to say to her that he is only gone before, and waits longingly for her coming, and she should try to win comfort out of the sad consciousness that—

'Tis better to have loved and lost,
Than never to have loved at all.

The world can not give any compensation for her great loss, but she is surely happier or will be happier if she will look at it from this point of view till the time shall come for their reunion.

In looking over my friend's life in its results I am forcibly reminded of that sad truth contained in Gray's lines:

The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
Await alike the inevitable hour;
The paths of glory lead—but to the grave.

Dr. STOKES was young in years; had scarcely reached the meridian of life. His public career had hardly begun, and the equipment furnished by years of study and extensive reading had promise of rich fruition. He had grown upon the people of our State during the twelve years since his return among us, and while the bitter strife which marked the period of his entry on the political arena had left some scars on other breasts, they seemed to have left none on his own.

The shafts of envy and malice had fallen hurtless, and his worth and high character had so impressed themselves on the people that in his last election he was unopposed by any competitor, and those who had at one time been his most bitter antagonists had been won to be warm friends, or acquiescent opponents, who had no ill for him. In the zenith of his fame and height of his usefulness he has been stricken down. We can not understand why these things are so; we can not lift the veil to find out why such a man should be taken and so many thousands less useful and less worthy should remain. We can not realize why the cords of love and devotion which bound him to life should have been snapped so ruthlessly.

The journey of life is full of these mysteries. We come into the world unbidden, or rather without having been consulted; we are hurried hence, often without warning and suddenly, without any power of resistence. We come and go like shadows and we know not why these things are so. Life is a battle from beginning to end, and the grave is the only place of rest. We are all hastening to it, and many are unconsciously very, very near its brink.

It is philosophical to think about death calmly, but the law of life makes us shun and dread it and put off to the very last the thought of the time when we shall bid adieu to this active scene. By common consent, all men, both ancient and modern, civilized and uncivilized, heathens and savages, have refused to accept death as an "unending sleep." The idea of annihilation is so abhorrent that the human soul recoils with terror from such an ending. Tennyson has most beautifully expressed the feeling of mingled fear and hope pulsating in our hearts when he says:

Oh, yet we trust that somehow good
Will be the final goal of ill;
To pangs of nature, sins of will,
Defects of doubt, and taints of blood.

That nothing walks with aimless feet;
That not one life shall be destroyed,
Or cast as rubbish to the void,
When God hath made the pile complete.

That not a worm is cloven in vain;
That not a moth with vain desire
Is shriveled in a fruitless fire
Or but subserves another's gain.

Behold we know not anything;
I can but trust that good shall fall
At last—far off—at last to all,
And every winter change to spring.

* * * * *

Strong Son of God, immortal Love,
Whom we that have not seen Thy face,
By faith, and faith alone, embrace,
Believing where we can not prove;

Thou wilt not leave us in the dust;
Thou madest man he knows not why;
He thinks he was not made to die;
And Thou hast made him: Thou art just.

In that blessed reunion to which every human soul looks, in the bright hereafter, "When the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest," may our friend and his loved ones left here be reunited; and may we all so live that when we come to die we shall have as few sins to answer for as the man in whose memory we speak to-day. His was indeed a noble and pure life, and in all my dealings with men I have never known one who more deserved to have it said of him—

And thus he bore without abuse
The grand old name of "gentleman."

Mr. MCLAURIN of South Carolina. Mr. President, death is always an unwelcome visitor and generally surprises us in the midst of the duties and schemes which are engrossing our lives. A noble and useful life is often ended in the heyday of its success and prosperity. It is well that it is so, for if we were permitted to control our mortal destiny we could never conveniently fix a time when we would travel to that "bourn from whence no traveler returns."

It is passing strange that we have the courage, energy, and persistency to pursue so hopefully the aims of this life, when we are so constantly reminded that at any moment the "silver cord may be loosed and the golden bowl broken."

The inspiration of hope obscures the shadow of the grave and impels us forward upon our earthly careers. Without this "death on the pale horse" would at every moment cross our pathway and overwhelm us with gloom.

But with all of our fears of death there is mixed a fixed belief in the immortality of the soul and that after the struggles and cares of this life there is "rest for the weary." Revealed religion teaches us that death is but the exit from this life into an everlasting heaven of unalloyed happiness. By its clear light alone can we see that man's mission in this world is to build and progress, to lift himself from a high to a higher plane of existence, and to constantly take into his soul and life more of that justice and charity which are to be his divine estate in the great beyond. Some day this great battle that has raged in the breast of each, between our brute natures and our immortal souls, will be over and our discordant natures brought into harmony with the spirit that controls all things in this great universe, and then, if we have made a good fight, the immortal spirit rises triumphant over mortal flesh, and, looking toward heaven, finds the burden easy and the upward pathway filled with light.

The death of Dr. J. WILLIAM STOKES, the Christian gentleman, the useful citizen, and faithful Congressman, in the meridian of his life work and the midst of his public duties, makes us all feel that he lived as he should have lived and that his translation from this life of care and sorrow was to one of rest and happiness in the unending future.

Dr. STOKES was the idol of the agricultural classes in South Carolina. They loved him; they trusted him; they honored him, and they now revere his memory. He came from their ranks and rose to high position in the State, and by their unswerving confidence and influence was transferred from the arena of State to the wider sphere of national politics. In every position in which he was placed he was true to his people and to the principles of which he was a living exponent.

When the Alliance movement materialized into a compact and influential organization he was one of the leaders in South Carolina, and by his aggressiveness and fidelity to its principles contributed largely toward making it the controlling factor in State politics. He was placed at the head of the State organization, and under his leadership it became a great educator of the masses, inspiring a spirit of independence of thought and action, which to some extent at least destroyed party tyranny and gave, in a measure, political freedom to the people.

The Alliance movement may have given rise to many "isms" in the politics of this country, and it has been derided as demagogery of the vilest type, but it is an undeniable fact that in the South it awakened the slumbering masses and gave to them freedom from party shackles, and created a wider interest in national affairs. In South Carolina it removed barriers which had existed for years between classes, broke down the traditions of a century, and delivered the people from the oligarchical rule which had controlled the material and political destiny of the State from the close of the Revolutionary war.

It was a part of the new era of progress in directing attention to needed reforms, and to the importance of developing the material resources of the State. Dr. STOKES, in the beginning, was one of the guiding spirits in this popular uprising, and well may he have felt that his life's work had left its enduring impress upon the fortunes of his native State. As a public man Dr. STOKES was pure, modest, and faithful to his creed of principles. He was candid and open in all he did, as firm as adamant in his convictions, and full of an unselfish patriotism.

His straightforward and manly course commended him to public confidence, and made him hosts of friends who continued him in Congress for several terms.

As a Representative, he was content to be a working rather than a speaking member. In committee and departmental work he was industrious and faithful. No request from a constituent was ever neglected nor his interest allowed to suffer if Dr. STOKES could prevent it. His most conspicuous work in Congress was in connection with the establishment of rural mail service. His whole soul and energies were in this work, because he felt that this would be to the masses another step in the great educational work commenced by him as president of the State Alliance. The record of Dr. STOKES in Congress will always stand as a testimonial to his faithfulness as a Representative not only to his own constituency, but to the country people everywhere.

As a private citizen Dr. STOKES was generous and loyal, ever ready to make sacrifices for the comfort and happiness of others. In whatever position he was placed he never failed to follow his convictions as to right and duty. He was a gentleman in the highest sense of the term, honorable, cultivated, and refined; all of his instincts were high, and elevating to those who came into contact with him.

His people mourn his loss and will ever keep in remembrance the shining virtues and unselfish life which made J. WILLIAM STOKES a truly good man, a useful citizen and Representative.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions submitted by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, June 16, 1902, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 14, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, for this day, which we hail with grateful hearts as the anniversary of the birth of our national ensign, a day set apart by a grateful people in commemoration of its victories and achievements, for we realize that the prosperity, intellectual, moral, and spiritual growth of our people, past and present, may be measured by their devotion to the flag. And we most fervently pray that the lesson of this day may sink deep into the hearts of the growing generation, that their loyalty, devotion, and love to Old Glory may be increased, that the principles which it represents may live forever. In the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CERTAIN BONDS OF THE TERRITORY OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. RODEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 14383) to validate certain acts of the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico with reference to the issuance of certain bonds.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of the thirty-fourth legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, entitled "An act providing for additional buildings for the New Mexico Military Institute at Roswell," approved February 20, 1901, and the act of the same assembly and session entitled "An act providing for additional buildings for the New Mexico Insane Asylum at Las Vegas," approved March 21, 1901, and the act of the same assembly and session entitled "An act to provide for the issue of bonds for the New Mexico College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts," approved March 21, 1901, be, and each of said acts hereby are, approved, ratified, validated, and confirmed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have some explanation of this.

Mr. RODEY. The explanation is this: Congress in 1898 gave New Mexico a grant of land for the benefit of its common schools and other educational institutions. This act of Congress granting these lands provided that the same might be leased and the rentals used for the benefit of the institution for which the grant was made. Now, some of these institutions are greatly in need of additional buildings for the use of the institution, and the Territory of New Mexico passed an act permitting the issuance of bonds secured by the lands which were granted to the Territory, and made provisions for turning the rentals toward the payment of interest on the bonds, and this bill is to ratify those acts of the legislative assembly. The bill has been considered by the committee and has been reported by the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COST OF CIVIL AND MILITARY GOVERNMENT IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to move for the discharge of the Committee on Insular Affairs from a resolution, No. 236.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman call it up as a privileged motion?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives a statement showing the amount of money expended by the United States Government since the 1st day of May, 1898, for the cost of the army serving in the Philippine Islands, for the maintenance of both the military and civil governments of said islands, for the transport service maintained between this country and the Philippine Islands, for the maintenance in the War Department of the Insular Bureau, and for any other purpose connected with the occupation and possession of the Philippine Islands by the United States.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the motion of the gentleman from Virginia on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia calls up resolution No. 236 and moves to discharge the Committee on Insular Affairs from the consideration of the same. The gentleman from Indiana moves to lay that motion on the table. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HAY) there were—ayes 54, noes 46.

Mr. HAY. I call for the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and at the conclusion of the roll call,

The SPEAKER said: The roll call shows—yeas 93, nays 67, answered "present" 12—not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, and the Sergeant-at-Arms will bring in members.

Mr. CLARK (having voted in the negative). Mr. Speaker, I wish to change my vote, if it can be done now; if not, I will wait until it can be done.

By direction of the Speaker, the Clerk again called the name of Mr. CLARK, and he answered "present."

Mr. KAHN (who had voted in the affirmative). I find that I am paired with the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT]. I desire to withdraw my vote and be recorded "present."

Mr. BOUTELL (who had voted in the affirmative). Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw my vote and be recorded "present."

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts (who had voted in the affirmative). I desire to withdraw my vote and be recorded "present."

The following-named members, who did not answer on the roll call, appeared, and upon their request, were marked "present:"

Mr. BENTON, Mr. MIERS of Indiana, Mr. WATSON, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. TONGUE, and Mr. MICKEY.

The roll call, as finally made up, was as follows:

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CANNON, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 15108) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for prior years, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and, with the acompanying report, ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri reserves all points of order upon the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice that at an early day in the coming week, the first opportunity I can get, I will ask the House to consider the bill.

CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES AT VALDOSTA, GA.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12205) to provide for circuit and district courts of the United States at Valdosta, Ga., and to transfer certain counties from the northern to the southern district of said State.

The Clerk read the bill and accompanying amendment thereto.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk has read. Is there objection?

Mr. LESTER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LESTER].

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FLEMING. Inasmuch as this objection was not anticipated, I wish to ask if the Chair will entertain a motion to suspend the rules and put the bill on its passage?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. This is not suspension day.

MINNEAPOLIS, SUPERIOR, ST. PAUL AND WINNIPEG RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15004) to authorize the Minneapolis, Superior, St. Paul and Winnipeg Railway Company, of Minnesota, to build and maintain a railway bridge across the Mississippi River; which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read the bill at length.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk has read. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FLETCHER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FEES OF UNITED STATES MARSHALS IN THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2769) to fix the fees of the United States marshals in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in felony cases before United States commissioners for preliminary examination, and in all cases in the district courts, whether arising under the laws of the United States or under the statutes of Arkansas, as made applicable to the Indian Territory, section 829 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be applicable to the services rendered by United States marshals and their respective deputies in said Territory, notwithstanding the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury in re United States Marshal Hammer, dated October 12, 1900, and all deductions and disallowances made by the accounting officers under the said decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States shall be allowed, except so far as the marshals have been reimbursed for the amounts of such deductions and disallowances; but before any item of such deductions or disallowances shall be allowed, proof satisfactory to the Auditor for the State and other Departments shall be made that the amount of such item has not been reimbursed to the marshal.

SEC. 2. That all witnesses in felony cases before United States commissioners, and all witnesses in civil and criminal cases in the district courts of said Territory, shall be entitled to the fees provided in section 848 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, except that clerks and other officers of the United States shall be entitled to the compensation provided in section 850 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "Territory," in line 10, page 1 of the bill, down to the word "and," in line 13, page 1 of the bill, and on page 2, line 1, the word "said," and add after the word "decision," in line 1, page 2 of the bill, the words "of the Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk has just read. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I will inquire what committee this bill is before?

Mr. CLAYTON. It comes from the Judiciary Committee, with a unanimous report.

Mr. CANNON. I would ask the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, what its effect is, in a word?

Mr. CLAYTON. The effect of it is to make sections 829 and 848 of the Revised Statutes applicable to the Indian Territory. Under the law as it now stands the United States marshal and the deputy marshals of the Indian Territory receive their fees and compensation as fixed in Mansfield's Arkansas Digest, which are payable to officers in that State for performing similar services there under State process, and witnesses in the Indian Territory are compensated under the same Arkansas law, which is made applicable to the Indian Territory.

The Attorney-General, every judge in the Indian Territory, and every district attorney says that on account of the inadequacy of those fees of the deputy marshals and of the fees to witnesses it is impossible to properly execute the criminal laws of the United States in the Indian Territory. Particularly is it true in the case of larceny, the stealing of cattle and horses, for under the Arkansas law, which is now the law covering the compensation in those cases in the Indian Territory, the witness gets only 50 cents a day for the attendance upon the commissioner's court and gets no mileage. If the gentleman from Illinois will do me the honor to examine the report that I had the honor to draw, he will find there a letter from the Attorney-General recommending the passage of this bill.

Mr. CANNON. Then the Department of Justice is in harmony with the proposed legislation?

Mr. CLAYTON. It is, and I may say, without violating any committee secrets, that this bill was drafted by the Department of Justice.

Mr. CANNON. And the committee are unanimous?

Mr. CLAYTON. Unanimously in favor of it.

Mr. CANNON. It will, however, somewhat, and properly so, increase the expenses.

Mr. CLAYTON. It will, but that is necessary for the efficient administration of the law. The bill simply equalizes the pay of marshals and witnesses in the United States courts of the Indian Territory with the compensation of marshals and witnesses in the United States courts in the States and other Territories.

Mr. CANNON. And it affects marshals and witnesses only?

Mr. CLAYTON. Marshals and witnesses.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

UNIFORM REGISTRATION OF BIRTHS AND DEATHS.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, by order of the Select Committee on the Census, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 184) requesting State authorities to cooperate with the Census Office in securing a uniform system of death registration was read, as follows:

Whereas the registration of deaths at the time of their occurrence furnishes official record information of much value to individuals; and

Whereas the registration of deaths, with information upon certain points, is essential to the progress of medical and sanitary science in preventing and restricting disease and in devising and applying remedial agencies; and

Whereas all of the principal countries of the civilized world recognize the necessity for such registration and enforce the same by general laws; and

Whereas registration in the United is now confined to a few States as a whole, and the larger cities, under local laws and ordinances which differ widely in their requirements; and

Whereas it is most important that registration should be conducted under laws that will insure a practical uniformity in the character and amount of information available from the records; and

Whereas the American Public Health Association and the United States Census Office are now cooperating in an effort to extend the benefits of registration and to promote its efficiency by indicating the essential requirements of legislative enactments designed to secure the proper registration of all deaths and the collection of accurate mortality statistics, to be presented to the attention of the legislative authorities in nonregistration States, with the suggestion that such legislation be adopted: Now, therefore,

Resolved, etc., That the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States hereby expresses approval of this movement and requests the favorable consideration and action of the State authorities, to the end that the United States may attain a complete and uniform system of registration.

Amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution requesting State authorities to cooperate with Census Office in securing a uniform system of birth and death registration."

The following committee amendments were read:

After the word "of," in the first line of the second paragraph of preamble, insert the words "births and."

After the word "deaths," in the fifth line of the sixth paragraph of preamble, insert the words "and births."

In the sixth line strike out the word "mortality" and insert the word "vital."

Amend the title by inserting after the word "of" the words "births and."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, as I caught it, this is a concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. A House joint resolution.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is in the form of a joint resolution, but it is a mere request.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I wish to reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The bill was prepared in the Census Office. Its object is to call the attention of the various States to the importance of establishing uniform registration laws, with a view of collecting statistics upon vital questions.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. What registration laws?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mortuary statistics, for the registration of births and deaths by the States. It is a simple request, and the only virtue of the resolution is to give this subject the prominence that it is entitled to in the collection of vital statistics, in order that the census work may be made of more value.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman will pardon me. It is almost impossible to get a correct understanding of a resolution from hearing it read at the desk; but it occurred to me that the resolution itself does not define its object. It simply provides for a registration, but does not say of births or deaths. The resolution itself had better be reported again.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The resolution does not purport to provide for anything, but it merely calls the attention of the States to the want of uniform and efficient registration laws, and asks that the States establish efficient laws for the collection of vital statistics, in order that the Census Bureau, in that important department of its work, may have records and may have access to reliable sources of information. That is all. It is a simple request to the States. It does not purport to establish anything.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would like to have the resolution read. Not the preamble, but the three or four lines of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will be again reported.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That says a "uniform system of registration," and that is all it says. Now, the preamble is not what is enacted, but the resolution is enacted.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The law requires the Census Office——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The resolution is what becomes a law, not the preamble. The resolution provides for a system of registration. It does not say whether a registration of voters, or of births and deaths, or of crime, or marriages, or anything else. I think it is a very poorly drawn resolution, if I may venture to make an expression of that kind.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think the gentleman misapprehends the purpose of the resolution. It does not purport to establish any system at all, but simply calls the attention of the country to the lack of uniformity in collecting vital statistics.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The resolution calls for it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It does not call for anything, but simply requests the States to adopt proper laws in order that the Census Office may have access to a source of information that is reliable, so that its reports may have some value. It simply increases the facilities of the Census Office to collect this class of statistics, and it only requests the State legislatures to establish those laws. It does not purport to do that.

Mr. CANNON. My friend will allow me. Is it anticipated, if this resolution should pass, that copies of the act will be mailed to the governors of 45 States, or is it anticipated that this resolution is to lay the foundation for sending 45 lobbyists to attend 45 State legislatures to promote legislation?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is no question of any additional foundation for this facility, and it does not authorize anything of that kind. Now, the facts are these: In many of the States of the Union there is absolutely no law providing for registering vital statistics, and everyone who is acquainted with the value of statistics recognizes the value of information of this kind. It is, under present conditions, impossible to get this class of statistics. It is in the line of mortality statistics, and in order that there may be a better and more uniform movement and a more perfect public service.

The law directs the Director of the Census to collect this class of statistics, and now he is compelled to go out wherever mortality statistics are registered and collect them as best he can. The Census Office thought that a resolution of this kind might lead the States to investigate the question and establish a uniform system of collecting vital statistics in order that the office might with greater facility and at less expense collect reliable information upon these topics, and that is the only purpose and only effect of the resolution. It simply requests the States to investigate the question and provide for the collection of vital statistics in order that the Census Office may collect them with greater facility and accuracy and less cost to the Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

BRIDGE ACROSS WHITE RIVER, ARKANSAS.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate bill 6030.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman ask to call up a Senate bill?

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. The House bill was 14780, but the same bill has passed the Senate.

The SPEAKER. But the Senate bill does not seem to be here.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. It has passed the Senate.

The SPEAKER. It has not been reported from the committee. The House has no power to act upon a Senate bill unless the original bill is here in some shape.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. I simply desire to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will wait until the original Senate bill can be obtained from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the Chair will recognize the next gentleman.

Subsequently,

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the bill (S. 6030) called up by the gentleman from Arkansas is now at the desk. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 6030) authorizing the Newport Bridge, Belt and Terminal Railway Company to construct a bridge across the White River in Arkansas.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce from the consideration of the bill just read and consider the same now. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BRUNDIDGE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

House bill 14780, on the same subject, was ordered to lie on the table.

RELATING TO THE ALLOWANCE OF EXCEPTIONS.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the following bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14919) relating to the allowance of exceptions.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 953 of the Revised Statutes be so amended as to read as follows:

"SEC. 953. A bill of exceptions allowed in any cause shall be deemed sufficiently authenticated if signed by the judge of the court in which the cause was tried, or by the presiding judge thereof if more than one judge sat at the trial of the cause, without any seal of the court or judge annexed thereto. And in case the judge before whom the cause has heretofore been or may hereafter be tried is, by reason of death, sickness, or other disability, or by reason of his resignation or removal, unable to hear and pass upon the motion for a new trial and allow and sign said bill of exceptions, then the judge who succeeds such trial judge, or any other judge of the court in which the cause was tried, holding such court thereafter, if the evidence in such cause has been or is taken in stenographic notes, or if the said judge is satisfied by any other means that he can pass upon such motion and allow a true bill of exceptions, shall pass upon said motion and allow and sign such bill of exceptions; and his ruling upon such motion and allowance and signing of such bill of exceptions shall be as valid as if such ruling and allowance and signing of such bill of exceptions had been made by the judge before whom such cause was tried; but in case said judge is satisfied that owing to the fact that he did not preside at the trial, or for any other cause, that he can not fairly pass upon said motion, and allow and sign said bill of exceptions, then he may, in his discretion, grant a new trial to the party moving therefor."

SEC. 2. That this act shall apply to all causes now pending, and to all causes pending for hearing upon motion for new trials, and to all causes pending for the allowance of a bill of exceptions.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Add immediately after the word "Statutes," in the third and fourth lines of the first page of the bill, the following words: "as amended by chapter 717 of the acts of the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress."

At the end of the bill an additional section be added as section 3, as follows:

"SEC. 3. That the provisions of this act are extended to and shall apply to the Territorial courts and to the courts of the district of Alaska."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to move that House bill 12717, upon the same subject, be laid on the table.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEVI H. COLLINS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 13278) granting an increase of pension to Levi H. Collins, with Senate amendment, which was read.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I move concurrence in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

FRANKLIN SNYDER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 7679) granting an increase of pension to Franklin Snyder, with Senate amendment, which was read.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I move concurrence in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

WESLEY BRUMMETT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 12420) granting a pension to Wesley Brummett, with Senate amendment, which was read.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

MARY E. CULVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 12828) granting a pension to Mary E. Culver, with Senate amendment, which was read.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I move concurrence in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL REQUEST.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted to Mr. FOSTER of Vermont for three days, on account of important business.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for consideration of bills on the Private Calendar under the special order for to-day.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, with Mr. CAPRON in the chair.

WILLIAM F. RANDOLPH.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11258) granting a pension to William F. Randolph.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William F. Randolph, late a pilot by appointment of Admiral Porter, and served as such for the United States Navy on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers from the 20th day of October, 1862, to the 3d day of August, 1865, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all of lines 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "of William F. Randolph, late pilot, United States Navy, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

ANNA MAY HOGAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 4710) granting a pension to Anna May Hogan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Anna May Hogan, widow of John Hogan, late of Company C, Thirty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $8 per month.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN R. CURRY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14024) granting an increase of pension to John R. Curry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John R. Curry, late of Company G, Thirteenth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $72 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 8 strike out the word "seventy-two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

HIRAM H. THOMAS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 5402) granting an increase of pension to Hiram H. Thomas.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Hiram H. Thomas, late of Company I, First Regiment Rhode Island Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

TIMOTHY DONOHOE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14355) granting an increase of pension to Timothy Donohoe.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Timothy Donohoe, late of Company B, Sixty-ninth New York Volunteer Infantry, to $18 a month in lieu of any pension now being received by him.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

CHARLES F. WOODFORD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8663) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Charles F. Woodford and grant him an honorable discharge.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to amend the military record of Charles F. Woodford, late a private of Company I, One hundred and first Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, so as to remove the charge of desertion and grant him an honorable discharge.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

After the word "discharge," line 7, insert: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, it was my intention to call to the attention of the committee the first bill of this character which was reached on the Calendar this day, but I was called out for a few moments, and during my absence two of those bills were passed. This bill is one like many that have been before the Committee on Military Affairs this year, the purpose of which is to falsify the records of the War Department, or, as it is called, to correct the record of that Department, and to this class of bills I feel it to be my duty to interpose every possible objection.

I want to say to the gentleman in charge of these pension bills that it has not been and is not my purpose to try to interfere with the passage of bills from his committee, concerning the particular merits of which I confess myself in almost entire ignorance; and if he is willing to pass over bills of this character I shall not take advantage of the fact that there is to-day a limited attendance in the House and shall not interpose the objection which otherwise I shall feel myself compelled to interpose to prevent the passage of these desertion bills.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas move that the bill be passed over?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do.

Mr. PAYNE. I am very sorry that the gentleman did not stay out a minute or two longer. I think this is the first bill I have ever had up in this House to remove a charge of desertion. Of course the gentleman is aware that there are general laws under which these corrections of military records have been made and charges of desertion removed. I think this is a meritorious case. I am sorry that the gentleman feels it his duty to come in just at this moment.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am very sorry, Mr. Chairman, that I was called out for the moment or two required to pass the two others which were passed. I have spent weeks in the aggregate in the consideration of these bills this year, and I confess that the more I investigate them the more I am convinced that the general powers lodged in the officials of the War Department have been more than adequate, more than liberal, and I do not believe that there ought to be any special legislation of this class. I have no desire so make myself objectionable to the distinguished gentleman from New York, but I simply conceive it to be my duty to interpose every possible parliamentary objection to the passage of these bills. If gentlemen want to call these bills up when there is a full House here and discuss them on their merits——

Mr. PAYNE. Of course the gentleman knows that this bill can not be called up with a full House, and if he objects to it, it defeats the bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I prefer to have the bill passed over.

Mr. PAYNE. Inasmuch as the gentleman did not enforce his objections to the other bills, I suggest that he let this go.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It was merely owing to the accident of my absence from the hall for ten minutes.

Mr. MANN. Can not the gentleman absent himself again?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I should like to accommodate the gentleman from New York, but my determination to oppose the passage of these desertion bills is unalterable. I move that the bill be passed over.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the gentleman has stated his attitude on these bills, I think it is only due to the members of the House who are besought to secure legislation of this class to state if there are any bills for the removal of charges of desertion or for the correction of military records that he will permit to pass the House.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Oh, yes, Mr. Chairman, there is one from the State represented by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, which I call to mind now, which, I believe, has special merit, and which, I think, should be passed; but I think all these bills ought to be considered by a quorum.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In view of the fact that the objection of one member will be sufficient to stop all legislation upon these different classes of bills, I think it is due to the House that the gentleman should state at some time at least in detail the class of bills which he considers meritorious and what class he considers unmeritorious, so that we can answer the inquiries of our constituents.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman understands perfectly well that I do not control the workings of this House; that it is impossible for me to do that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No; but we never have a quorum on these days.

Mr. SLAYDEN. He must know that if an objection is interposed it will require a quorum to proceed with legislation; and I believe that more than 99 per cent of the legislation of this character is so irredeemably vicious that it is my duty to interpose every possible parliamentary objection to the enactment of this class of legislation. Now, I do not say that I am opposed to every single bill that is considered and reported from that committee. I have supported some of them in the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman misunderstands me. By reason of his service on the committee——

Mr. SLAYDEN (continuing). Why not pass over this bill and go on with pension legislation?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman misconstrues my position. By reason of his knowledge of the bills that are before his committee he could give us an idea as to what he deems meritorious and such as he deems unmeritorious in his opinion, and then we would know what we should write to our constituents. I think the gentleman ought to give us some idea as to what will pass.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, of course I do not wish to delay the passage of these bills, and I would like this bill to go over without prejudice. I want to say, however, for the benefit of the gentleman from Texas, I could not help wondering where the gentleman was two weeks ago when one of these bills was upon the Calendar, introduced by my colleage from New York, who sits upon that side of the Chamber, which was reported adversely from the Committee on Military Affairs, when an objection of this kind would have defeated the bill. I think some one might have called him out ten minutes at that time.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It gives me pleasure to state to the gentleman that I voted against that bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; but the gentleman did not interpose any such obstructive tactics as he does now. Of course he knows there is no quorum here, and there can not be a quorum. If the gentleman insists upon his course the bill will simply have to go over with others perhaps beyond this session of Congress. The gentleman knows that two weeks ago he could have done the same with the other bill, but he seems for some reason not to have done so. I ask that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman from New York entirely misapprehends my position. The other bill was acted on in the committee in my absence, and I opposed it in the House, notwithstanding the solicitation of the gentleman he refers to.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman knows that a single objection in the Committee of the Whole would have defeated that bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the bill under consideration be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

JOSEPH ROBERTSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12155) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Robertson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Joseph Robertson, late of Company K, First and Fourth Massachusetts Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 6, before the word "Robertson," insert the letter "W."
In line 6, after the word "Fourth," insert the word "Regiments."
In line 8 strike out the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-four."

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, it is as much the duty of every citizen of the Republic to teach patriotism as that of the minister of the gospel to inculcate the teachings of the lowly Nazarene. The Republic is founded on knowledge, patriotism, and the spirit of the Golden Rule. I know of no more appropriate or better way of teaching patriotism than for Congress on the days set apart for the consideration of special pension legislation to recall the deeds of valor and acts of heroism endured by the heroes of our wars, and by sending a ray of sunshine and hope to some old battle-scarred veteran by increasing his pension, not as a mere gratuity or charity, but in recognition of the debt of gratitude this great nation owes to the defenders of the Republic.

On this anniversary day of the birth of our flag it is especially fitting. One hundred and twenty-five years ago to-day Betsy Ross, of Philadelphia, at the request of George Washington, gave to the world our Stars and Stripes, the most beautiful emblem of all the nations of the earth. In this National Capital, the home of the flag, it has a peculiar significance. It is the symbol of our union, the record of our progress, the message of fair play and independence. "It is the emblem of patriotism, the winding sheet of our heroes, the ornament of their graves, the bright prophecy of our future glory." Let us with the school children of the nation tell the old, old story of the birth of the American Republic and our flag, and may she ever wave as the emblem of peace, prosperity, and the recognition of human liberty and the patriotism taught by our fathers. [Loud applause.]

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I move that the committee rise and report to the House the various bills acted on, with the action thereon by the Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAPRON reported that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, having had under consideration certain private bills, had directed him to report them back with the recommendation that House bill 13373 and Senate bill 5213 be laid on the table, and that various other bills of the Senate and the House be passed with or without amendments, as respectively recommended.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I ask unanimous consent that the previous question be ordered upon these various bills, with or without amendments, as respectively reported, to their final passage, except the two bills recommended to be laid on the table.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KEAN presented a petition of Iron Molders' Local Union No. 99, of Bridgeton, N. J., praying for the passage of the so-called eight-hour bill; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented petitions of the Burlington County Retail Liquor Dealers and Hotel Keepers' Protective Association, of Mount Holly, and of sundry citizens, all in the State of New Jersey, praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the internal-revenue law relative to the tax on distilled spirits; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of the Lincoln Club, of Paterson, and of Journeymen Barbers' Local Union No. 381, of Hoboken, in the State of New Jersey, praying for the enactment of legislation increasing the compensation of letter carriers; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. DOLLIVER presented a petition of the Tri-City Labor Congress, of Clinton, Iowa, praying for the enactment of legislation to increase the compensation of letter carriers; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of the board of directors of the Citizens' National Bank, of Davenport, Iowa, praying for the enactment of legislation reducing the limit of population for reserve cities to 25,000 instead of 50,000; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of Wesley Harding Post, No. 384, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Iowa, of New London, Iowa, praying for the enactment of legislation to modify and simplify the pension laws; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented petitions of United Mine Workers' Local Union No. 201, of Brazil; of United Mine Workers' Local Union No. 1721, of Hilton; of Esther Lodge No. 352, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Estherville, and of Local Union No. 553, United Mine Workers of America, of Centerville, all in the State of Iowa, praying for the passage of the so-called Grosvenor anti-injunction bill; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CLAY. I present a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Atlanta, Ga., and also a memorial adopted by the Atlanta Freight Bureau, of Atlanta, Ga., remonstrating against what is known as the Elkins bill, legalizing the pooling of freight. I ask that the memorials be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the memorials were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Memorial adopted by the directors of the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce June 13, 1902.

Whereas Senator ELKINS has introduced in the United States Senate a bill which legalizes pooling of freight by the railroads of this country, which we believe would be greatly to the disadvantage of both shippers and producers: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the directors of the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce are opposed to the passage of said bill, and the secretary is instructed to write our Senators and Representatives in Congress, asking them to use their best efforts for the defeat of the measure.

Resolved further, That the secretary be instructed to communicate this action of the directors to other boards of trade and commercial bodies in this section and request them to take the same action.

Memorial adopted by the Atlanta Freight Bureau June 10, 1902.

Whereas, our attention having been called to a bill now pending in the United States Senate known as the Elkins bill, the purpose of which being to legalize pooling of freight by the railroads of this country, which we believe would be greatly to the disadvantage of both shippers and producers: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Atlanta Freight Bureau is opposed to the passage of said bill, and its traffic manager is hereby instructed to write Senators A. O. BACON and A. S. CLAY and Congressman L. F. LIVINGSTON, requesting them to use their best efforts toward the defeat of said bill.

CRIMINAL, PAUPER, AND DEFECTIVE CLASSES.

Mr. CLAPP. I present a paper, being a publication by Dr. Arthur MacDonald, specialist in the United States Bureau of Education, Washington, D. C., on the study of man and abnormal man with reference to bills to establish a laboratory for the study of the criminal, pauper, and defective classes. By mistake a part of the matter was omitted in Senate Document No. 400, this Congress, and I move that a reprint of that document be ordered and that this additional matter be included.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BURNHAM, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3354) for the relief of G. W. Ratleff, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. TALIAFERRO, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5950) for the relief of Henry O. Bassett, heir of Henry Opeman Bassett, deceased, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 13204) to provide for refunding taxes paid upon legacies and bequests for uses of a religious, charitable, or educational character, for the encouragement of art, etc., under the act of June 13, 1898, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. FORAKER, from the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, submitted a report to accompany the amendment heretofore reported by him from that committee and referred to the Committee on Appropriations proposing to appropriate $1,000,000 to pay in part the judgments rendered under act of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Hawaii by the Fire Claims Commission of that Territory for property destroyed in the suppression of the bubonic plague in that Territory in the years 1899 and 1900, intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 14411) to regulate commutation for good conduct for United States prisoners, reported it without amendment.

PROTECTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3653) for the protection of the President of the United States, and for other purposes, to report them back and recommend that the Senate nonconcur in the House amendments, and ask for a conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate nonconcur in the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill and request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate: and Mr. HOAR, Mr. FAIRBANKS, and Mr. PETTUS were appointed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MCENERY introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 6168) for the relief of the estate of Joseph Gradengo, deceased;

A bill (S. 6169) for the relief of Alphonse Meuillon;

A bill (S. 6170) for the relief of Lucien Meuillon;

A bill (S. 6171) for the relief of Martin Guillory;

A bill (S. 6172) for the relief of Jean Baptiste Lazare;

A bill (S. 6173) for the relief of the estate of Alexander Lemelle, deceased; and

A bill (S. 6174) for the relief of the estate of Rigobert Lemelle, deceased.

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a bill (S. 6175) for the relief of the legal representatives of Warren Mitchell, deceased; which was read tiwce by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PETTUS introduced a bill (S. 6176) for relief of Mrs. A. E. Hardin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MASON introduced a bill (S. 6177) to provide for holding an exposition in the city of Chicago from August 14 to September 14, 1902, for the purpose of endowing the Home for the Aged and Infirm Colored People, and showing the progressive growth of the negro since emancipation; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. QUARLES introduced a bill (S. 6178) to amend secttion 4 of an act entitled "An act to provide for a permanent Census Office," approved March 6, 1902; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Census.

Mr. MALLORY introduced a bill (S. 6179) granting a pension to Green W. Hodge; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. CLAPP. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be read.

The joint resolution (S. R. 117) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to Acker Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of St. Paul., Minn., 2 condemned cannon and 16 cannon balls for ornamenting burial grounds of deceased soldiers in that city, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized to deliver, if the same can be done without detriment to the Government, 2 condemned cannon and 16 cannon balls to Acker Post, No. 21, Department of Minnesota, Grand Army of the Republic, St Paul, Minn., for the purpose of ornamenting burial grounds of deceased soldiers in said city.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask that the joint resolution may lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Should it not be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. CLAPP. Let it lie on the table. I would rather get the views of the Department at once, and then it can be taken up. It is a small matter, and there can be no question about it if the Department recommends it. If that can be done I should prefer that it be not referred to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The ordinary way is for the committee to refer it to the Department and the committee receives a reply, and then reports the bill.

Mr. CLAPP. I have found by experience that I can do that myself in about half the time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks that the joint resolution may lie on the table. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

PAYMENTS FROM CUBAN FUNDS.

Mr. TELLER. I submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas it seems impracticable to prepare during this session of Congress an itemized statement showing the collection and disbursement of all funds for the whole period of the military occupation of Cuba; and

Whereas it is important that a statement be now made of the accounts hereafter named: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate the following:

A full itemized statement of all payments made out of Cuban funds to any persons or corporations, if any, for the purpose of promoting "reciprocity" between the United States and Cuba, at any time during the military occupation of Cuba by the United States, and whether such payments were authorized or approved by the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. KEAN. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will go over under the rule.

JOHN H. LAUCHLY.

Mr. DEBOE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8840) granting an increase of pension to John H. Lauchly, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same.

WM. J. DEBOE,
N. B. SCOTT,
PARIS GIBSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
HENRY R. GIBSON,
RUD. KLEBERG,
S. W. SMITH,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

DAVID M. M'KNIGHT.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3992) granting an increase of pension to David M. McKnight, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "twenty-four;" and the House agree to the same.

J. H. GALLINGER,
WILLIAM J. DEBOE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
A. B. DARRAGH,
E. S. HOLLIDAY,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14046) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. HALE, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. TILLMAN were appointed.

CLARA W. M'NAIR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1225) granting an increase of pension to Clara W. McNair; which was, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty" and insert "forty."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. DEBOE, and Mr. TALIAFERRO were appointed.

CLAYTON P. VAN HOUTEN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5506) granting an increase of pension to Clayton P. Van Houten; which was, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives and request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. TURNER were appointed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 13th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 3800) to grant certain lands to the State of Idaho;

An act (S. 4071) granting an increase of pension to George C. Tillman; and

An act (S. 4927) granting an increase of pension to Hattie M. Whitney.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 2497) to correct the military record of John P. Evans; and

A bill (H. R. 6405) removing the charge of desertion from the record of William Harig.

The bill (H. R. 14383) to validate certain acts of the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico with reference to the issuance of certain bonds was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The bill (H. R. 14919) relating to the allowance of exceptions was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE IN MINNESOTA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 15004) to authorize the Minneapolis, Superior, St. Paul and Winnepeg Railway Company, of Minnesota to build and maintain a railway bridge across the Mississippi River, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. NELSON. There is a similar bill on the Calendar of the Senate, and I ask that this bill may take the place of the bill on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without reference to a committee?

Mr. NELSON. Yes. There is a Senate bill exactly like it on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator know that the House bill is identical with the Senate bill?

Mr. NELSON. It is an identical bill. I know it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that instead of House bill 15004 being referred to a committee, it may take the place of an exactly like measure, the bill (S. 6079) to authorize the Minneapolis, Superior, St. Paul and Winnepeg Railway Company, of Minnesota, to build and maintain a railway bridge across the Mississippi River, reported from the Committee on Commerce and now on the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered, and Senate bill 6079 will be indefinitely postponed.

LONDON DOCK CHARGES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate Senate bill 1792.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1792) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to navigation of vessels, bills of lading, and to certain obligations, duties, and rights in connection with the carriage of property."

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, the last time this matter was before the Senate, those in favor of the bill desired the opponents to give some reason so that we could see what opposition, if any, the companies have against the proposed measure. I have listened to the arguments during the several days the bill has been before the Senate, but I confess I have heard nothing whatever as a defense to the proposition made by the bill brought in by the Senator from Minnesota.

We have been passing around the hat here for several days for a single fact in opposition to the proposition which is made. The conservative Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] simply bases his opposition upon the ground that we should go slowly; that we should be careful; that we might be infringing unlawfully upon the right to make contracts. In this he seems to be seconded by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], but there has been nothing given to us from which we could see that we are running on dangerous ground or that we are liable to bring up any matter that will be harmful to the interests even of the companies themselves.

Mr. President, I can not see that this measure affects the question of the liberty of contract in any way whatever. It is one of the most common propositions in the world that any sovereign state or government has a right to determine what acts are against the public policy of that state. We have done it in our navigation laws before. I see no reason why we can not do the same thing in reference to them to-day. In every one of our States we have laws declaring what may be lawful in warehouse contracts, declaring what shall be unlawful in reference to provisions relative to public warehouses. We have the same even in reference to attorneys' charges, so that in most of our States it is unlawful in foreclosures of mortgages and otherwise to contract for a higher than a certain rate or percentage upon the amount involved.

Mr. President, Congress has supervisory power over interstate commerce and over foreign commerce. In its supervisory powers it certainly has authority to determine what is a discrimination. Congress is met to-day with these conditions. Here are certain companies that will take a load of lumber from, say, Duluth, through the lakes, through the North Atlantic ports to London and make certain charges over and above the freight charges. Another ship of the same company will take another load of lumber to Liverpool and they will not make those charges. Not only that, but the same company may send one of its vessels down to the Gulf ports and take another load of lumber from there and they will make no charges. Not only that, but we are met with a proposition which I do not understand is denied, that they will take lumber or grain to some ports and make no charges whatever for delivery, while when they take it to the port of London, although they load it on lighters and there is not one cent of expense in addition connected with it, they will nevertheless make a charge.

Mr. President, this bill simply prohibits that from being done. It prohibits it on the ground that it is the duty of Congress to prevent discrimination in ocean freight rates, and if this is not a discrimination I certainly would be pleased to have any Senator here explain to me what other mild name he would give to it. If it is a discrimination in our foreign commerce, there is no question about the right of the Government to deal with it, and, having that right, it seems to me but just and proper to make an absolute prohibition against it.

I should like to have anyone explain any sound reason why these freights, which are a discrimination between different ports of the United States and which are a discrimination between different foreign ports, in reference to our goods that are taken there, should not be eliminated from all contracts pertaining to ocean transportation. If there is any good reason to be given, I believe the Senate would like to hear it. If there is not, I certainly should feel disposed to vote for the proposition that is contained in the bill.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to repeat some of the things I have stated before. We come before the Senate asking for this relief in behalf of the shippers and producers of this country. I will state the grounds for our demand that relief be given.

First. By the general rules of maritime law the charge of freight or the contract of affreightment, as it is called in legal parlance, the freight paid, covers not only the carriage of the goods, but their delivery. This is the general rule of maritime law applying in all cases. But by the custom and law prevailing at the port of London this matter is further strengthened and emphasized by the fact that under the law and regulations governing that port consignees are entitled to a free delivery of the goods on board of lighters and boats in the river, and if the steamship company, for their own convenience, instead of discharging the cargo direct by the side of the barges and lighters, see fit first to place it on the dock and then from the dock back into lighters again, in that case the law still provides that they must do it without any special charge.

As I stated before, there is something peculiar about the port of London. In all other ports when goods are landed on the dock from steamship companies they are carried away by land carriage. But in the port of London, which I may in brief say is a water port, of the goods landed on the docks the bigger share of them are immediately put back on barges and lighters for distribution in the city. The report of Mr. Choate as well as the hearings before the committee show that upwards of 75 or 76 per cent of all the goods discharged on the docks are taken immediately back on barges and lighters for distribution.

This charge of the steamship companies that they impose is not for the handling of the goods on the dock. It is for discharging the goods on the dock and putting them back on the lighters. If the goods are left on the dock by the steamship company and not put back into lighters, then they are subject to a charge of the dock company, and this bill does not interfere with that matter at all. If the consignment of flour, lumber, corn, oats or anything is discharged and left on the dock and not put back into barges and lighters it becomes subject to the charges of the dock company, which vary according to the commodity from 3s. 6d. up to 5s. a ton.

This bill does not propose to meddle with that. We simply insist that for the service of discharging cargo from the vessel on the dock and there back on the lighters the steamship companies shall not insist and claim an arbitrary and fixed charge. We say that that service is a part of the freight for which they are paid when they are paid for carrying the cargo. All we ask is to be put upon a footing of equality with all other consignments of goods by water to the port of London. Over 76 per cent of the goods entering the port of London by steamship companies are not subject to this charge. It is only found in the bills of lading of the steamship companies plying in the North Atlantic trade; that is, the ports of the Atlantic. It does not include even the Gulf ports.

If this clause was not inserted in the bills of lading that charge could not be enforced in London; the consignee or shipper would not be subject to the charge. But their courts over there hold that because the bill of lading contains that clause it overrides the common law and the act of Parliament, or, as the court puts it, they contract themselves outside of the common law and the act of Parliament.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] said the other day that people ought to have the liberty to make such contracts as they see fit. As a general proposition I agree to that—there ought not to be any rule or regulation interfering with them; but where there is a combination among all the steamship lines plying in this trade, an ironclad trust or combination, the shippers are entirely helpless. They have got to accept that bill of lading or retain their goods. They are utterly and entirely at the mercy of the steamship companies.

We have many instances where the courts or where Congress turns in to relieve people against such combinations. Under the general power given Congress to regulate commerce, Congress has the power to regulate the instrumentalities of commerce. We have as much right to say in this instance, as we did at the time the Harter law was enacted, that these contracts shall not be valid. In the Harter law we forbade them to insert clauses in the bill of lading exonerating themselves from liability for their own negligence or the negligence of their servants. We said that a bill of lading containing any such exemption should be null and void, and here we ask that a bill of lading containing this London clause shall be null and void; that is, the London clause itself, not the rest of the bill of lading. We are applying exactly the same measure of relief, acting upon the same constitutional theory and on the same constitutional ground, as we did in the case of the Harter law.

It was not seriously contended before the Committee on Commerce, in fact, it was not intimated, that we had not the constitutional right and power to pass this legislation.

I want to call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to one fact. When this bill was before the Committee on Commerce—and I think it was there in all from first to last over two months, and we had a great many hearings—nothing of the kind was insisted upon as the Senator himself insists upon. I remember very well the other day how indignant the Senator got because the Senator from Arkansas intimated that the friends of the steamship companies had been very active in this matter. The Senator from New Hampshire got up very warmly and insisted that no one had approached him on the subject. The Senator was mistaken about one fact, and in that he was quite excusable. He was mistaken in the fact that there had been no hearings or no arguments made in behalf of the shipping interests before the committee.

Evidently—and I say it without intending to reflect on the Senator from New Hampshire in the least—evidently somebody has handed him that bill of lading which he brought here before the Senate. Who it was I do not know. There is one peculiarity about that bill of lading. It is in French. It is dated the 1st or 2d of February, 1902. It is in print and then diagonally across it in a rubber stamp, in purple, they have got a signed clause in similitude of the London clause. That is brought in here at this time, when we heard nothing of the kind before the committee. There was no intimation in any hearing before the committee that there was any such bill of lading used by the Oriental Steamship Company; but it is brought in here through the Senator from New Hampshire. I do not refer to this for the purpose of criticising the Senator. I know he is acting in good faith. I have not the least bit of fault to find with him. I only refer to this matter incidentally. I think, with all due respect to the Senator, he has been imposed upon, and that that bill of lading has been fixed up for the occasion, because we never heard of it before.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. But I acquit the Senator, as I said, of any intentional purpose here in this case to mislead the Senate. I think he is badly misled, as I was, and the rest of us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am somewhat astonished at the statements of the Senator from Minnesota. I would ask the Senator if he has any proof whatever that that bill of lading is not a legitimate bill of lading and that the impress on the face of it is not a genuine impress. The Senator intimates that there has been some fraud perpetrated. Mr. President, it is easy to make a charge of that kind. I should like to ask the Senator if he has the least earthly proof to sustain the allegation of fraud.

Mr. NELSON. My proof is only circumstantial. What proof has the Senator that that rubber-stamp clause on it is a genuine thing? I say to the Senator from New Hampshire that my circumstantial evidence is this: That the steamship companies were represented by their agents and attorneys—able men—and they covered every point of the case. He will find that in no case did the Oriental Steamship Company make any such claim as is claimed by this bill of lading.

Now, I do not want the Senator from New Hampshire to misapprehend me. I am not criticising him or finding any fault with his conduct in the matter—I think he has acted in good faith in the matter—but I am simply giving my candid opinion on that subject.

I see that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is not here, but I shall refer to nothing personal, so that it does not make any difference. The Senator from Massachusetts offered an amendment the other day which would absolutely destroy the bill. It would take the heart out of it. Every friend of this measure who believes in giving us relief ought to vote down that amendment. The Senator in that amendment insists, among other things, that there are expenses which the steamship company incurs in discharging the cargo that ought to be open to contract and an agreement to be paid.

What would the Senator from Massachusetts think if, upon a consignment of goods from Boston to Springfield of railroad freight, the railroad company were to impose an extra charge for placing the goods on the depot platform and also delivering them back into the carts and drays? They might just as well insert in the bill of lading of freight carried by railroads a clause requiring the shipper to pay a given amount of freight from Boston to Springfield, and then an additional amount for landing those goods on the platform and for delivering them from the platform of the railroad depot back into the train or the conveyance that takes them away.

We ask for this legislation, Mr. President, to be put exactly on a par with the other countries in the port of London. That is all the relief we ask in this case. Why should American products and American goods be penalized in the port of London? Why should the steamship companies oppose this if it was not because there is, to use a slang phrase, a big rake-off in it?

Mr. President, I shall not take up the time of the Senate any further than simply to state that the two amendments, the one offered on behalf of the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr.

LODGE] and the one offered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], are utterly destructive and would destroy this bill. If those amendments should be incorporated in the bill, they would render it utterly useless. They would utterly destroy all the vitality and force of the bill, and it would give no relief in the cases where relief is desired.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not want to delay so important a measure at this late stage of this important session, but I wish very much that it might not be disposed of until my colleague returns. My colleague will be here, I suppose, to-day. He has conferred with very important interests in this matter in Massachusetts which are affected by the bill. I gave such attention to it as I did the other day because of my colleague's absence. I undertook to look into the matter and spoke to him about it and found he was looking after it. He went away quite overworked. As the Senate knows very well, he has had charge of very important matters indeed during the session. I suggest that the bill go over until to-morrow. I see there are but three Senators in their seats on one side of the Senate and very few on the other.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I trust this bill will not be delayed. The bill has been on the Calendar since early in March. I have for three months persistently tried to get consideration for it, and I trust we can dispose of the bill in some way this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER rose.

Mr. HOAR. I made the request. I know it is pretty unreasonable to ask a Senator when a bill is once up to displace it in any way. If it is going to be debated, I will not press the request. I thought it might be debated to-morrow instead of to-day.

Mr. GALLINGER. I rise simply to say, Mr. President, that I have had no disposition to obstruct the consideratian of this bill. I think there is a great deal of misinformation about it, and I confess myself to not fully understanding what is aimed at in this measure. I think it ought to be discussed further on both sides. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is not present——.

Mr. CULLOM. He is here.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg pardon. That, then, obviates the necessity of my saying what I was going to submit. The Senator from Maine has I think, more particularly knowledge of the matter than some of the rest of us, and as he has offered some amendments I hope that they will be carefully considered.

I have only this to say: That the Senator from Minnesota, in season and out of season, has contended, and contended this morning, that this measure relates only to the port of London. Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Maine has offered an amendment restricting the measure to the port of London. I will ask the Senator from Minnesota if he is prepared to accept that amendment?

Mr. NELSON. Which amendment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Restricting it to the port of London, the amendment the Senator from Maine offered two or three days ago.

Mr. NELSON. I want to be as candid with the Senator as though I was in a camp meeting among Christian brethren. I have not anything to conceal. The only place we aim to get relief at in this case is against these iniquitous charges in the port of London.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. I wanted to make an explanation. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall be glad to get it. I asked the Senator the question, whether he is prepared to accept the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. NELSON. I was going to make a statement on that subject, but if the Senator is not through I will yield to him.

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall be glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. NELSON. I was going to state to the Senator the difficulties I have in mind. There are two things that occur to me in reference to the matter. First, would a bill of that kind, limiting it expressly to one port by name, be constitutional and valid? Would it not be held as a species of special legislation that could not be sustained by the courts?

Now, while the bill is general in its terms, not naming any particular port, it is special in this, that it defines certain classes of conditions, and aims to get relief against certain conditions that exist nowhere else except in the port of London. It aims to protect shippers against the imposition imposed by steamship companies such as are imposed by the London clause and nowhere else. It does not aim at any other case, I will say. I have looked into this matter, and I do not know of another port in the world, and none was brought to the attention of the committee, as you know, Mr. President, where the law and conditions are the same as in the port of London.

Now, another matter. This amendment limiting it to the port of London simply contains that provision. As it is incorporated in the bill it becomes a part of the Harter law. Section 5 of that law contains a limited penal clause providing for a fine in case they violate the law.

Let me ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he would be willing to admit that section of the Harter law in here as supplemental to this? I will read it. I want to say further, and I submit it to the consideration of the lawyers of the Senate, if a law limiting it in express terms to the port of London is constitutional and valid, that will be satisfactory to me. I should have no objection to limiting it to the port of London. This legislation does not aim at any other port at all.

The Harter law, to which this bill is amendatory, has the following section:

SEC. 5. That for a violation of any of the provisions of this act the agent, owner, or master of the vessel guilty of such violation, and who refuses to issue on demand the bill of lading herein provided for, shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $2,000. The amount of the fine and costs for such violation shall be a lien upon the vessel whose agent, owner, or master is guilty of such violation, and such vessel may be libeled therefor in any district court of the United States within whose jurisdiction the vessel may be found. One-half of such penalty shall go to the party injured by such violation and the remainder to the Government of the United States.

Now, that is a part of the Harter law. The Harter law, as the Senator from New Hampshire remembers, prohibits their inserting certain clauses in the bill of lading and puts in that penalty. In the form in which the bill is it becomes a part of the Harter law and that section 5 would apply, but if you have it in an independent form, as this amendment is offered, it would not apply and there would be no penal clause to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say for myself, in answer to the interrogatory of the Senator from Minnesota, I am quite willing to have that penal clause attached to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine, and I trust the Senator from Maine will agree to it. The purpose of the amendment is not to amend the Harter Act, which relates to an entirely different subject, but to have an independent measure denying to a steamship company the right to put this covenant or agreement in their bills of lading as relates to the port of London.

I am very fully satisfied myself, Mr. President, that if that is done the men who are now complaining through the Senator from Minnesota will be glad to make terms within twelve months with the steamship companies, because it is a well-known fact that the large steamship companies can not unload as the small steamships used to do, and there will necessarily be charges that will be more onerous, in my judgment, upon the shippers than the shipper has to pay under that covenant or agreement.

I think it is proper that there should be a penal clause attached to the amendment the Senator from Maine has offered to the bill, and I certainly will cordially agree to it if the Senator from Maine will agree to it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, my attention was diverted for a moment. I did not understand the proposition which was made by the Senator from Minnesota about a penal clause.

Mr. NELSON. I did not make any definite proposition. I said that if the bill is amended that penal clause ought to be put in. I still doubt the constitutional validity of an act that would expressly name one port.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It seems to me that there is a very great difference between the Harter Act, if I understand what that is, and this proposed act, and I think that difference was recognized the other day in the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. The Harter Act, if I understand it, was to compel the freighters or shipowners to observe the obligations to which common carriers are subject under the common law, and if they violate those, I can see the propriety of a penal section.

But this measure, I imagine, is entirely outside of that. It does not touch the question of the obligations of common carriers under the common law, but is with reference to a contract made between the shippers and the shipowners. I should think it would be going a good ways to say that they should not make a certain contract with regard to the disposition of goods after they get them to London and then impose a severe penalty upon them if they disregard it. I do not think that the two cases are similar or parallel.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, by reason of the colloquy between the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], I may say, as resulting from a flashing out from the contact of the two minds, the Senator from Massachusetts prepared a very reasonable amendment and offered it.

Certainly I can not see how anybody desiring to do nothing more than what is fair can object to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. It simply, as I understood it when read, provides that the shipowner may include in his contract, which the shipper shall pay, all charges that the shipowner is obliged to pay in London or in a foreign port. Certainly it will be going very far, as is contended for on the part of the advocates of this bill, to say that there shall not be put into this contract between the two parties a provision that the shipowner may provide a contract for the shipper paying what the shipowner is obliged to pay in a foreign port, and yet, as I understand it, when the Senator from Minnesota was appealed to, and his attention was called to the reasonableness of this amendment, he said it would destroy his bill. Well, then, clearly the bill is an extreme, a drastic, and an unreasonable bill. If it is a bill that will not stand such a provision, if it is a bill that will not stand an amendment so reasonable as that, then it is a bill that never ought to pass. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota, who has drawn the bill, if he can give the Senate any reason why the shipowner shall not be allowed to put into his contract a provision that the shipper shall pay to him what the shipowner has to pay in a foreign port?

Now, listen:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall prevent the carrier from stipulating for the reimbursement to him by the shipper or consignee of any charges which he may be lawfully compelled to pay, or for compensation for any service which he may agree to render.

I repeat that I should like to have somebody tell me, and tell the Senate, why, in a case of contract between two parties, each of whom is presumed to be able to take care of himself, the shipper consenting to a clause of this kind should not have it enforced? Why should we declare that a provision of that kind is against law and can not be enforced?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] suggests to me that this is not a case of our protecting somebody who is not capable of looking out for himself; it is not a case of protecting an innocent, unwary man who can not and does not read fine print; but it is a case of contract made between two sets of men, either of whom are as sharp, as keen, and as capable of caring for their own interests as any set of men in the United States. I will pit the millers and lumbermen of the West against the shipowners of the Atlantic coast. They do not need additional protection because of their innocence. They are not poor men. They do not come here in forma pauperis. They are entirely capable. They are doing an immense business and making great profits. The freight upon flour between Minneapolis and London has been cut down one-half within ten years, and the shippers have got the benefit of it. Their exports from here and their importations into London have increased nearly 50 per cent during that time. They do not come here to us under an atmosphere of misfortune and under a showing that entitles them to a statute that says in terms that when certain provisions are put in the contract and agreed to they shall not be enforced.

Again I say I should like to have somebody state why this provision should not not be incorporated:

That nothing in this act shall prevent the carrier from stipulating for the reimbursement to him by the shipper or consignee of any charges which he may be lawfully compelled to pay, or for compensation for any service which he may agree to render.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I will just make one remark in response to that statement. All the legitimate charges involved in the matter of discharging the cargo can be included in the contract of affreightment with the steamship company.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will just put that in the bill, that will be sufficient.

Mr. NELSON. That is the principle of general maritime law, and I am surprised that the Senator from Massachusetts does not understand it.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose we both understand it. I was just trying to get some light from my honorable friend from Minnesota about this matter, and I will say to him——

Mr. NELSON. Let me state my own view of this matter, and you can then state yours.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will put into his bill what he has just stated to be the universal practice of maritime law, that will remove the whole difficulty.

Mr. NELSON. There is no sense in the Senator's suggestion, with all due respect to him. We do not interfere in this bill at all in the matter of contracts. They can make any contract they wish. If I want to ship a carload of lumber or a carload of wheat or a carload of flour, there is nothing in this bill to prevent the steamship company from exacting any rate of freight they please. We do not interfere with that. But it is a principle of maritime law that when you hire a steamship company to carry your goods from port to port the contract of affreightment includes the delivery and discharge of that cargo, and any reasonable charges that the steamship companies are entitled to make for discharging they can include in their freight charges.

Now, let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts—I will put a case, as the Senator was not in the Chamber when I spoke this morning—what would he think of a railroad company carrying a carload of freight from Boston to Springfield at a certain given charge if the railroad company should insert a Springfield clause in the bill of lading, so that in addition to the freight the consignee shall pay a certain fixed charge for delivering the goods from the cars to the platform of the depot and from the platform of the depot back into the car and carrying them away? That is exactly a parallel situation. The railroad company in their freight charges do this very thing. So in this case any expense entailed in discharging the cargo by the steamship companies they can include in their freight. There is nothing in the least to hinder that in this bill. Any charges they have to pay for hiring men to discharge the cargo or anything of that kind they can make a part of the contract of affreightment, and there is nothing in this bill to prohibit them from doing so. What we ask is that whatever charges are made shall all be included in this item of freight, so that when we send goods from this country to London we know what the freight is, and that is the end of it. This bill does not interfere with the matter of freight at all. That will be left as free as it is to-day. We do not interfere with it in the least.

We ask for the passage of this bill, because if this charge is made a part of the freight it will be subject to competition and fluctuate with the rate of freight. It is now an arbitrary and fixed charge, varying from 1s. 9d. to 2s. 6d. a ton in addition to the freight. They have raised it two or three times, and have threatened once more to raise it; and against this charge we object.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the carrier can cover the London terminal charges by increasing the freight charges, what benefit would the shippers derive if the dock charges were included as a part of the freight?

Mr. NELSON. At present it is not subject to any competition whatever. It is an arbitrary and fixed charge, and there is no competition about it; but if it is made a part of the entire freight charge, there is competition, and the consignee or the shipper has the benefit of it.

Mr. HALE. There is the same competition now.

Mr. NELSON. There is no competition now. What competition is there about the London dock clause?

Mr. HALE. Any company may say, if they choose, "We will adopt this clause, which has been in existence for years and has worked well, and we will charge so much less freight."

Mr. NELSON. It works well for the steamship companies, but it does not work well for the shippers.

Mr. HALE. The question of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] was a pertinent one.

Mr. NELSON. I have answered it.

Mr. HALE. But your answer is that there is some competition now on freight.

Mr. NELSON. There is no competition under the London clause. It is an arbitrary and fixed charge.

Mr. HALE. But there is a competition on freight.

Mr. NELSON. Very well.

Mr. HALE. If there ever was competition on freight there is competition now.

Mr. NELSON. But there is no competition now under this London dock clause. The steamship companies made a combination, refused to receive goods, and refused to issue bills of lading unless that London clause was inserted. The lumbermen and millers can not build steamship lines of their own.

Mr. HALE. There is competition with these half dozen lines from Boston, New York, and Portland that are shipping flour. The Boston people can say, "We do not want to interfere with this general proposition, with this settled policy, with this London dock clause fixing the charges for unloading freight over side on to lighters and barges; we do not want to disturb that; we have carried your freight for so much less than the New York companies have carried it, enough less to offset the London dock charge," and if there is any competition now there will be just as much then. We will have to deal with the same men the Senator speaks of, the millers and the lumbermen of the West, as we have now; and there will be no more competition than there is now. The same men who make the agreements will hold to them then just as they do now.

I think the Senator's bill does not proceed on any broad ground, but on the one single ground that he desires to get this strong language agreed to, and he invokes the aid of Congress to protect men who, so far as I know, have always been well able to take care of themselves. They will not get a penny's benefit out of this bill if it is passed.

Mr. NELSON. Then why do you oppose it, if there is no profit in it for the shipowner?

Mr. HALE. I oppose it because for twelve years this arrangement in London has worked admirably to everybody. Instead of throwing the whole business open to the charges of dockmen, lightermen, bargemen, and everybody else, it is all concentrated at one place and paid by one party, and the ship going out and coming back will be three days quicker under this clause than she will be if it is repealed and she is thrown upon the mercy of everybody.

There is no over-side unloading now, as there used to be, and there ought not to be. There is a regular dock charge, which has been fixed, and if it were repealed the millers and lumbermen would be anxious to have it restored.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator a question.

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Take a ship going into the port of Liverpool. Would she not be three days quicker in going to and returning from that port? Those charges do not have to be paid in that port.

Mr. HALE. They do. They do not call them London dock charges, but they are of the same nature.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then I have misunderstood the matter.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is wrong about that. They have the same charge at Liverpool, at Manchester, at Bristol, and at some other ports. They are precisely alike, although they are not called London dock charges.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator is utterly mistaken. There was nothing of that kind shown in the evidence before the committee.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it seems to me the point is a very simple one, and the answer to my honorable friend's contention is a very simple one. He says why do they not have on the railroad from Boston to Springfield a provision that the railroad company may make Springfield charges in discharging the freight from the trains. The answer is that we control Springfield. That would be under United States law if it were interstate commerce, and under the law of the Commonwealth if it were State commerce.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Do we not control, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, the matter of contracts made in this country?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Then can we not prevent the insertion in these bills of lading of a contract to pay the London dock charges?

Mr. HOAR. I understand all that. I hope the Senator will wait a moment and let me state my proposition. We do not control London. We can not say by act of Congress that when an American ship gets to London she shall not have to pay a certain dock charge, whether it is local or general. If the owner of the steamship has got to pay that dock charge, he is entitled to be reimbursed. That my honorable friend agrees to. There may be cases where a cargo of flour is taken in ballast—and we had to take a great many cargoes coming this way in ballast, cargoes of Italian marble and similar products, in former times—there the shipowner would get actually nothing from the shipper, though he would have to pay the dock charges; and he ought to be reimbursed. Now, my honorable friend says, "But you ought to put that in the freight." I agree to all that; but make your freight charge include it.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. HOAR. I am answering the Senator's question, and I will answer it with his permission.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator that there is no prohibition in this bill against including that in the freight.

Mr. HOAR. That is what I am myself saying, that there is nothing in this bill including it in the freight; and the Senator asks, Is not that fair?

Mr. NELSON. The Senator from Massachusetts misunderstands me.

Mr. HOAR. No.

Mr. NELSON. I say there is nothing in this bill prohibiting them from including it in the freight.

Mr. HOAR. What I meant to say was that there is nothing in this bill prohibiting the shipowners from including it in the freight. My honorable friend says, why is not that fair? The answer to that question of his is because the matter is contingent; it applies to one port, but does not apply to another; it depends upon an authority in London which we can not control, and therefore it is not fair to all shippers to have included a charge in the freight which the steamship owner may have to pay or may not; the only fair thing is to say that if he has to pay it, he shall be reimbursed, and if he does not have to pay it, he shall not be reimbursed. That is what we are contending for.

When I called his attention to that point and said if the steamship company has to pay this charge they ought to be reimbursed, my honorable friend from Minnesota said: "Certainly; my bill does not prevent that." Then the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], a most excellent lawyer, who replied to some things which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] had said against the bill, looked at the bill and said he was afraid the bill does prevent that; that it does not mean what the Senator from Minnesota thinks it does. So the Senator from Minnesota agrees that his bill ought to have the exact principle for which I contend, and he thinks he has got it in now, but the Senator from Wisconsin says it is not in now. Therefore, all we want is to have the bill say clearly that it does mean just what my friend from Minnesota thinks it means, and what the Senator from Wisconsin thinks it does not mean. All I desire is to have it appear that if the owner of a steamship has to pay lawful charges or to employ lawful services he shall be reimbursed, and if he does not have to pay them he shall not be reimbursed.

Is it not fairer to allow the parties to agree to that than it is to say you shall make a charge in all cases which shall cover that, whether you have to pay these charges or not? That is all there is between us two.

Then there was some suggestion, which the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] very well answered, why we do not want fine print clauses in a contract of this kind which the parties do not understand. There is a great deal of sense in that suggestion, because such clauses are often found in contracts of life insurance with poor people and in contracts of fire insurance on the dwelling houses of poor people; but it is a very different thing when you come to these contracts with the great millers and shippers of grain in my honorable friend's part of the country—the Washburns, the Pillsburys, and the other gentlemen whose names are familiar to my friends here. They are the sharpest, wisest, most proficient, and most successful business men on the face of the earth. The idea of putting Mr. William D. Washburn or Mr. Pillsbury under guardianship and saying that they shall not be permitted to make a contract with a steamship company to carry a cargo of flour to Liverpool for so much, and saying "if you have to pay for certain wharf charges, you may charge that in addition." The idea of putting either of those gentlemen under guardianship, and saying he shall not be permitted to do that. While I will not say that anything my honorable friend says is not wise, I will say that I have heard him say a great many wiser things than that in the course of my acquaintance with him.

Mr. NELSON. I will ease the mind of the Senator from Massachusetts on one point, and that is as to Mr. Pillsbury, who has got beyond the realm of guardianship, and is now, I hope, in the realms of bliss.

Mr. HOAR. If he has got beyond the realm of guardianship and into the realms of bliss, he is not now in favor of this bill. I am quite sure of that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was an amendment offered to the bill by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall prevent the carrier from stipulating for the reimbursement to him by the shipper or consignee of any charges which he may be lawfully compelled to pay, or for compensation for any service which he may agree to render.

Mr. HALE. That is all right. I shall withdraw the other amendment so that this one may be voted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], which has been read. [Putting the question.] The "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. HALE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. KEARNS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. GIBSON] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS]. We have transferred our pairs, so that the Senator from Maryland will stand paired with the Senator from Montana, and the Senator from Arkansas and myself are at liberty to vote.

Mr. MALLORY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MITCHELL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 9, nays 36, not voting 43; as follows:

YEAS—9.

Aldrich,	Gallinger,	Hoar,	Platt, Conn.
Burnham,	Hale,	Kean,	Wetmore.
Frye,

NAYS—36.

Allison,	Deboe,	McLaurin, Miss.	Platt, N. Y.

Daniel,	Gibson,	Money,	Wellington.
Depew,	Hanna,	Patterson,

So Mr. HOAR'S amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FOOD ADULTERATION, ETC.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3342) for preventing the adulteration, misbranding, and imitations of foods, beverages, candies, drugs, and condiments in the District of Columbia and the Territories, and for regulating interstate traffic therein, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Manufactures with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Secretary proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I wish to ask what is before the Senate and how it is before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, it having been taken up on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It has been taken up on motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been taken up on motion.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What is its present condition?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the amendment reported by the Committee on Manufactures is being read.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the amendment, which is to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That for the purpose of protecting the commerce in food products and drugs between the several States and in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States and with foreign countries the Secretary of Agriculture shall organize in the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture a food and drug division and such other divisions as may be necessary to properly conduct the work of said Bureau. The Bureau of Chemistry shall have the direction of the chemical work of the Department of Agriculture and of the chemical work of the other Executive Departments whose respective heads may apply to the Secretary of Agriculture for such collaboration, and shall also be charged with the inspection of food and drug products, as hereinafter provided in this act. The Secretary of Agriculture shall make necessary rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of this act, under which the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry shall procure from time to time, or cause to be procured, and analyze, or cause to be analyzed or examined chemically, microscopically, or otherwise, samples of foods and drugs offered for sale in original unbroken packages in the District of Columbia, in any Territory, or in any State other than that in which they shall have been respectively manufactured or produced, or from a foreign country, or intended for export to a foreign country. The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to employ such chemists, inspectors, clerks, laborers, and other employees as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act and to make such publication of the results of examinations and analyses as he may deem proper.

SEC. 2. That the introduction into any State or Territory or the District of Columbia from any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia or from any foreign country, or shipment to any foreign country, of any article of food or drugs which is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act is hereby prohibited; and any person who shall ship or deliver for shipment from any State or Territory or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or to a foreign country, or who shall receive in any State or Territory or the District of Columbia from any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or foreign country, or who, having received, shall deliver, for pay or otherwise, or offer to deliver to any other person, any such article so adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, or any person who shall sell or offer for sale in the District of Columbia or the Territories of the United States such adulterated, mixed, misbranded, or imitated foods or drugs, or export or offer to export the same to any foreign country, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and for such offense be fined not exceeding $200 for the first offense and for each subsequent offense not exceeding $300 or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 3. That the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry shall make or cause to be made, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, examinations of specimens of foods and drugs offered for sale in original unbroken packages in the District of Columbia, in any Territory, or in any State other than that in which they shall have been respectively manufactured or produced, or from any foreign country, or intended for shipment to any foreign country, which may be collected from time to time in various parts of the country. If it shall appear from any such examination that any of the provisions of this act have been violated, the Secretary of Agriculture shall at once certify the facts to the proper United States district attorney, with a copy of the results of the analyses, duly authenticated by the analyst under oath.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of every district attorney to whom the Secretary of Agriculture shall report any violation of this act to cause proceedings to be commenced and prosecuted without delay for the fines and penalties in such case provided.

DEFINITIONS.

SEC. 5. That the term "drug," as used in this act, shall include all medicines and preparations recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia for internal and external use. The term "food," as used herein, shall include all articles used for food, drink, confectionery, or condiment by man or domestic animals, whether simple, mixed, or compound.

ADULTERATIONS AND MISBRANDING.

SEC. 6. That for the purposes of this act an article shall be deemed to be adulterated—

In case of drugs:

First. If, when a drug is sold under or by a name recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia, it differs from the standard of strength, quality, or purity as determined by the test laid down in the United States Pharmacopœia official at the time of the investigation.

Second. If its strength or purity fall below the professed standard under which it is sold.

That such drug shall be deemed to be misbranded:

First. If it be an imitation of or offered for sale under the name of another article.

Second. If the package containing it or its label shall bear any statement regarding the ingredients or the substances contained therein, which statement shall be false or misleading in any particular, or if the same is falsely branded as to the State or Territory in which it is manufactured or produced.

In the case of confectionery an article shall be deemed to be adulterated:

If it contain terra alba, barytes, talc, chrome yellow, or other mineral substances or poisonous colors or flavors, or other ingredients deleterious or detrimental to health.

In the case of food an article shall be deemed to be adulterated:

First. If any substance or substances has or have been mixed and packed with it so as to reduce or lower or injuriously affect its quality or strength, so that such product, when offered for sale, shall deceive or tend to deceive the purchaser.

Second. If any substance or substances has or have been substituted wholly or in part for the article, so that the product, when sold or offered for sale, shall deceive or tend to deceive the purchaser.

Third. If any valuable constituent of the article has been wholly or in part abstracted, so that the product, when sold or offered for sale, shall deceive or tend to deceive the purchaser.

Fourth. If it contain any added poisonous ingredient or any ingredient which may render such article injurious to the health of the person consuming it.

Fifth. If it consists in whole or in part of a filthy, decomposed, or putrid animal or vegetable substance, or any portion of an animal unfit for food, whether manufactured or not, or if it is the product of a diseased animal, or one that has died otherwise than by slaughter.

An article of food shall be deemed to be misbranded:

First. If it be an imitation of or offered for sale under the distinctive name of another article: Provided, That the term "distinctive name" shall not be construed as applying to any article sold or offered for sale under a name that has come into general use to indicate the class or kind of the article if the name be accompanied on the same label or brand with a statement of the place where said article has been manufactured or produced.

Second. If it be mixed, colored, powdered, or stained in a manner whereby damage or inferiority is concealed, so that such product, when sold or offered for sale, shall deceive or tend to deceive the purchaser.

Third. If it be labeled or branded with intent so as to deceive or mislead the purchaser, or purport to be a foreign product when not so, or is an imitation, either in package or label, of another substance of a previously established name, or which has been trade-marked or patented.

Fourth. If the package containing it or its label shall bear any statement regarding the ingredients or the substances contained therein, which statement shall be false or misleading in any particular, or if the same is falsely branded as to the State or Territory in which it is manufactured or produced.

Provided, That an article of food which does not contain any added poisonous or deleterious ingredients shall not be deemed to be adulterated or misbranded in the following cases:

First. In the case of mixtures or compounds which may be now or from time to time hereafter known as articles of food, under their own distinctive names, and not included in definition fourth of this section.

Second. In the case of articles labeled, branded, or tagged so as to plainly indicate that they are mixtures, compounds, combinations, imitations, or blends: Provided, That the same shall be labeled, branded, or tagged so as to show the character and constituents thereof: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed as requiring or compelling proprietors or manufacturers of proprietary foods which contain no unwholesome added ingredients to disclose their trade formulas, except in so far as the provisions of this act may require to secure freedom from adulteration or imitation: Provided further, That no dealer shall be convicted under the provisions of this act when he is able to prove a written guaranty of purity, in a form approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, as published in his rules and regulations, signed by the manufacturer or the party or parties from whom he purchased said articles: Provided also, That said guarantor or guarantors reside in the United States. Said guaranty shall contain the full name and address of the party or parties making the sale to the dealer, and said party or parties shall be amenable to the prosecutions, fines, and other penalties which would attach in due course to the dealer under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 7. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to fix standards of food products when advisable and to determine the wholesomeness or unwholesomeness of preservatives and other substances which are or may be added to foods, and to aid him in reaching just decisions in such matters he is authorized to call upon the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry and the chairman of the committee on food standards of the Association of Official Agricultural Chemists, and such physicians, not less than five, as the President of the United States shall select, three of whom shall be from the Medical Departments of the Army, the Navy, and the Marine-Hospital Service, and not less than five experts, to be selected by the Secretary of Agriculture by reason of their attainments in physiological chemistry, hygiene, commerce, and manufactures, to consider jointly the standards of all food products (within the meaning of this act), and to study the effect of the preservatives and other substances added to food products on the health of the consumer; and when so determined and approved by the Secretary of Agriculture such standards shall guide the chemists of the Department of Agriculture in the performance of the duties imposed upon them by this act. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture, either directly or through the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry and the chairman of the committee on food standards of the Association of Official Agricultural Chemists and the medical officers and experts before mentioned, to confer with and consult, when so requested, the duly accredited representatives of all industries producing articles for which standards shall be established under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 8. That every person who manufactures or produces for shipment and delivers for transportation within the District of Columbia or any Territory, or who manufactures or produces for shipment or delivers for transportation from any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to any other State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or to any foreign country, any drug or article of food, and every person who exposes for sale or delivers to a purchaser in the District of Columbia or any Territory any drug or article of food manufactured or produced within said District of Columbia or any Territory, or who exposes for sale or delivers for shipment any drug or article of food received from a State, Territory, or the District of Columbia other than the State, Territory, or the District of Columbia in which he exposes for sale or delivers such drug or article of food, or from any foreign country, shall furnish within business hours, and upon tender and full payment of the selling price, a sample of such drugs or articles of food to any person duly authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture to receive the same and who shall apply to such manufacturer, producer, or vender, or person delivering to a purchaser such drug or article of food, for such sample for such use, in sufficient quantity for the analysis of any such article or articles in his possession. And in the presence of such dealer and an agent of the Department of Agriculture, if so desired by either party, said sample shall be divided into three parts, and each part shall be sealed by the seal of the Department of Agriculture.

One part shall be left with the dealer, one delivered to the chief of the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture, and one deposited with the United States district attorney for the district in which the same is taken. Said manufacturer, producer, or dealer may have the sample left with him analyzed at his own expense, and if the results of said analysis differ from those of the Department of Agriculture the sample in the hands of the district attorney may be analyzed at the expense of the said manufacturer or dealer by a third chemist, who shall be appointed by the president of the Association of Official Agricultural Chemists of the United States, and the analysis shall be conducted, if so desired, in the presence of a chemist of the Department of Agriculture and a chemist representing the dealer, and the whole data obtained shall be laid before the court.

SEC. 9. That any manufacturer, producer, or dealer who refuses to comply, upon demand, with the requirements of section 8 of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be fined not exceeding $100 or imprisonment not exceeding one hundred days, or both. And any person found guilty of manufacturing or offering for sale, or selling, any adulterated, impure, or misbranded article of food or drug in violation of the provisions of this act shall be adjudged to pay, in addition to the penalties hereinbefore provided for, all the necessary costs and expenses incurred in inspecting and analyzing such adulterated articles which said person may have been found guilty of manufacturing, selling, or offering for sale.

SEC. 10. That any article of food or drug that is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, and is transported or being transported from one State to another for sale, or if it be sold or offered for sale in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States, or if it be imported from a foreign country for sale, or if intended for export to a foreign country, shall be liable to be proceeded against in any district court of the United States, within the district where the same is found and seized for confiscation, by a process of libel for condemnation. And if such article is condemned as being adulterated, the same shall be disposed of as the said court may direct, and the proceeds thereof, if sold, less the legal costs and charges, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, but such goods shall not be sold in any State contrary to the laws of that State. The proceedings of such libel cases shall conform, as near as may be, to proceedings in admiralty, except that either party may demand trial by jury of any issue of fact joined in such case; and all such proceedings shall be at the suit of and in the name of the United States.

SEC. 11. That this act shall not be construed to interfere with commerce wholly internal in any State, nor with the exercise of their police powers by the several States: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to interfere with legislation now in force, enacted either by Congress for the District of Columbia or by the Territorial legislatures for the several Territories, regulating commerce in adulterated foods and drugs within the District of Columbia and the several Territories, except wherein such legislation conflicts with the provisions herein.

Mr. MCCUMBER. On behalf of the committee, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota offers an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "definition," in line 21, page 19, strike out the words "fourth of this section" and insert in lieu thereof the words "first of misbranded articles of food in this section;" so as to read:

First. In the case of mixtures or compounds which may be now or from time to time hereafter known as articles of food, under their own distinctive names, and not included in definition first of misbranded articles of food in this section.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCCUMBER. On page 20, line 21, after the word "to," I move to strike out the word "fix" and insert in lieu thereof the words "determine what are the highest;" so as to read:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to determine what are the highest standards of food products, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not desire to make any further remarks upon this bill, except to call attention to one or two objections that have been made to it and to give a very short explanation of it.

This bill, I desire to say, has the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Agricultural Department. Section 1 provides that the Bureau of Chemistry, which is already established in the Department of Agriculture, shall be organized into a pure food and drug bureau, or a division in that Bureau shall be organized which shall be known as the bureau of food and drugs. It also provides that this division is to inspect food and drug products either for the manufacturer or for the Department in the prosecution of its labors. It also provides that the Department of Agriculture may publish the results of its examinations.

We then come to section 7, to which there was some slight objection before the committee, but when we got through with our labors I received letters from those firms who had appeared in opposition to the bill, and I do not find any of them urging any objection whatever to the bill now as amended.

By section 7 the Secretary of Agriculture is to determine what are the highest standards—that is, if advisable, he is to make the determination. He fixes no standard absolutely, but that bureau is simply to determine for the information of the public what are the highest standards of food products, and also to determine the wholesomeness of preservatives and substances which are usually added to foods.

Now, how is he to do this? He is to call to his assistance the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, and the chairman of the committee on food standards of the Association of Official Agricultural Chemists, and not less than five physicians or experts (three of whom shall be from the Medical Department of the Army, the Navy, and the Marine-Hospital Service), and not less than five experts, to be selected by the Secretary of Agriculture, skilled in physiological chemistry, hygiene, and also experts in food, commerce, and manufactures. These experts are compelled to confer with and consult all duly accredited representatives of all food industries.

It also provides that the Secretary of Agriculture is to fix and determine these high standards——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MCCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, as he is explaining this section, I should like to ask him what the Association of Official Agricultural Chemists is. Is it a voluntary association?

Mr. MCCUMBER. I wrote to the Department of Agriculture, which recommends this bill, for just the information the Senator desires, and I will read its statement:

The Association of Official Agricultural Chemists grew out of a movement inaugurated by Mr. H. J. Redding, now director of the Georgia Agricultural Experiment Station, who induced Hon. J. T. Henderson, commissioner of agriculture of the State of Georgia, to call a meeting of the agricultural chemists of the United States in May, 1880. This meeting was held in Atlanta and adjourned to meet later in the season, in Boston, in connection with the American Association for the Advancement of Science. This meeting took place in August, 1880.

A tentative plan of cooperation was agreed upon in these meetings, but for some reason the organization lapsed and no further meetings were called until the spring of 1884, when another meeting of agricultural chemists was held in Atlanta. This meeting adjourned to meet in Philadelphia, where, on September 8, 1884, a formal organization of the agricultural chemists took place, which has remained unbroken to the present time.

This organization was at once taken under the auspices of the United States Department of Agriculture, and since that period has been recognized as an important branch of the agricultural work of that Department. The proceedings of the association are published as bulletins of the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department, and the chief of that Bureau has been the permanent secretary of the association since 1889.

The constitution of the association contains, among others, the following provision:

"Chemists connected with the United States Department of Agriculture or with any State or national agricultural experiment station or agricultural college or with any State or national institution or body charged with official control of the materials named in section 1 shall alone be eligible to membership."

The clause of section 1 referred to relates to the investigation of fertilizers, soils, cattle foods, dairy products, and other materials connected with agricultural industry.

A list of the members who have attended the meetings of the society is found on pages 14 to 16 of Bulletin No. 57 of the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture. A historical sketch of the association up to 1899 is found in the same bulletin, pages 16 and following.

The association represents practically every chemist occupying any official position in the United States connected in any way with agriculture or agricultural products. The study of foods, both for man and beast, has been one of the chief functions of this association, and in order to secure definite and reliable ideas in regard to the composition of foods the association several years ago appointed a committee on food standards, a highly representative body, including members from every part of the United States who are experts on food investigations. The chairman of this committee, thus officially constituted and recognized as an official or employee of the Government, and holding as he does a commission from the Secretary of Agriculture, as special agent to study foods, is designated in this bill as one of the members of the commission to study the composition of foods, food standards, and the effect of preservatives, coloring matters, and other substances added to foods upon the health. The qualifications and credentials of such a member as this are of the highest character. The present chairman of the committee on food standards is Dr. William Frear, chemist and assistant director of the agricultural experiment station of Pennsylvania.

I think that answers the query of the Senator from New Hampshire concerning this association, and I have read it so that he may understand it quite fully.

Mr. GALLINGER. I notice that in addition to the chairman of that association and the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry 5 physicians are to be appointed, 3 of whom are in the service and 2 of whom are not in the service, and 5 experts. Twelve distinguished scientists are to have charge of this matter of determining the standards of food, etc. But I do not find any provision in the bill for paying those men. I will ask the Senator from North Dakota how they are to get pay for their services. These five experts will be very high-priced men, and presumably the two physicians, in addition to those who are in the service, are to be high-priced men. I take it the chairman of the association, the chief of the bureau, and the agricultural chemists will likely want some additional pay, and I do not find any provision in the bill for paying them. Perhaps there is some provision that I have overlooked.

Mr. McCUMBER. In answer to that I will say that those who are selected from the Army, the Navy, and the Marine-Hospital Service are persons who are already making a study of just the particular matters which will be important information to be given to the Secretary of Agriculture, and I suppose that the payments they are receiving now will compensate them for this additional service. In other words, they have a right to call upon these parties for this additional service.

Mr. GALLINGER. I had reference to the others, I will say, Mr. President.

Mr. McCUMBER. The others, who are to be selected by the President, I presume, will be paid out of the funds which are voted for the Agricultural Department for general deficiency purposes. I do not understand that these other five would be required to be called in on every occasion, but they may be called in to give advice. I presume that there is sufficient revenue and sufficient funds in the Department of Agriculture to pay them, as it now pays numerous assistants who are not specially provided for in any bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator if that will likewise apply to the provision in section 1, where the Secretary of Agriculture is "authorized to employ such chemists, inspectors, clerks, laborers, and other employees as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act?"

Mr. McCUMBER. He has a right to employ them generally for the purposes of the Agricultural Department under the law as it now stands. I do not understand that this will add very materially to the expenses of the Department. In fact, I am informed by the Department that it will not, that they are already employing these chemists over the country, and they can utilize them for this purpose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Have we given the Secretary of Agriculture authority to employ an indefinite and unlimited number of chemists, inspectors, etc? If we have, I think it is rather an extraordinary stretch of authority to put in the hands of any head of a department.

Mr. McCUMBER. He is authorized at the present time to employ under the present law, as I understand it, such chemists as may be necessary. That he is doing. The Secretary of Agriculture has not abused the privilege that has been conferred upon him by the law in any excessive employment of chemists, and, as I said, I am informed they can use the same chemists they are now using throughout the country without any additional expense.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I am not familiar with this bill. I have not had an opportunity to understand its details. I find in section 7 this provision at the beginning of the section:

> That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to fix standards of food products when advisable.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That has been changed.

Mr. McCUMBER. That has been changed by striking out the word "fixed." It reads:

> To determine what are the highest standards of food products.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. When that determination is made, what is the result of the bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. Nothing, except that it is for the general information of the public. As I have stated before, section 7 may be entirely stricken out without in any way affecting the general character of the bill. Section 7 provides for the dissemination of general knowledge pertaining to pure and perfect foods. That is its object, and it has no further object.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. May I ask right on this point, is it supposed that the Secretary of Agriculture, in the way provided here, is going to fix and determine what is the best article of food that is sold and publish it to the United States. For instance, we have heard a great deal about baking powder. Is he to determine and tell us what is the best baking powder? There is a variety of such articles. Is he to fix and determine and publish to the country which is the best of all the different articles of food product which are pure? It is a pretty large power to place in the hands of any one man to advertise the food products of any concern in the United States as being the best products made in the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. In answer to the query of the Senator I would say that that is not the intent nor any fair construction of the bill. In fact, we have sought to avoid anything of that kind.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. How does section 7——

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, I do not know that it increases the power given to the Secretary of Agriculture beyond what it is now. He can already determine what is the best kind of flour, what is the character of the best ingredients, and what a pure flour should contain. He can already determine what ought to be the highest standard, the different chemical constitutents of the highest character of, for instance, corn meal or of buckwheat flour. It is the same with sirup and the same with sugar. It does not add in any way to his present power in the dissemination of knowledge which he has already given to the public upon those matters.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator how section 7 now reads. I think he said the provision that the Secretary shall fix the standard of food has been changed.

Mr. McCUMBER. It was done simply because there was a misunderstanding. The word "fixed" seemed to carry with it the idea that if a standard was determined to be a high standard everything else must come up to that or it would be illegal; and there is nothing of that kind in the bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I wanted to understand how the Senator proposes to change the section he says has been changed. I should like to know how it has been changed.

Mr. McCUMBER. It has been already changed.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. How?

Mr. McCUMBER. By striking out the word "fixed," so as to read:

> That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to determine what are the highest standards of food products, when advisable.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It seems to me, then, that the question asked by the Senator from Connecticut is decidedly pertinent. If the Secretary of Agriculture is to determine which are the best classes of food there will be tremendous power in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture in determining between rival manufacturers which has the best product.

Mr. McCUMBER. I suppose the Secretary of Agriculture may determine, and it would properly be his duty to determine, whether certain ingredients, even in baking powders, were injurious. If, after calling in all these experts, they decide that certain ingredients in baking powder are injurious to the health of the public, I suppose that some persons might suffer as a result of that decision, if, as a matter of fact, their food products when examined did not come up to that standard, or did contain ingredients injurious to the health of the people.

That is one of the objects of the bill. It is that the Secretary of Agriculture may determine with all of these, the best experts in the United States, what are the highest standards, and then all manufacturers will come up to that standard as near as possible. It does not make any of their products illegal, but all may be shipped from one State to another State.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It does not make their products illegal, but suppose——

Mr. McCUMBER. I meant that it does not make the sale of them illegal.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But suppose the Secretary of Agriculture, assisted by this board that he chooses of high medical officers and the association of expert chemists, and all that, should come to the conclusion that Pillsbury flour was the best flour in the United States and so advertise it. They immediately, if they got such a judgment as that, would advertise it, if the Secretary did not. They would say, "Our flour has received the sanction of this great board, which is provided by the Government, as being the best flour in the United States."

Mr. CULLOM. And comes up to the highest standard.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. And comes up to the highest standard. Would not that practically give them a tremendous advantage over all other flour manufacturers who might be producing flour which in some degree perhaps did not come up to the very highest standard? Now, take the matter of cereals.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can explain that, Mr. President.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. In just a moment. I want to take the matter of cereals. Here are a great many cereals—hundreds of them. Suppose that the Secretary of Agriculture with this board, which is provided, after laborious consideration and hearings, which are provided for here, shall determine that the best standard cereal in the United States is "H. O."

Mr. GALLINGER. Or Postum Cereal.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Or Postum Cereal, or some of those foods which are advertised and sold. What a tremendous advantage that gives to the manufacturers of those foods! Ought we to put any such power as that into the hands of anyone.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is not all the way this bill works. Let me explain to the Senator. What will the Department of Agriculture determine, if they determine anything? They will determine what is the highest standard of flour. How will they determine it? They will simply say that a high standard of flour will be a flour that contains such a percentage of starch, such a percentage of gluten, such a percentage of lime, such a percentage of water, etc., including all the ingredients, that a flour of that kind is most easily digestible, that it can be assimilated with the least injury to the system. They make that announcement after obtaining the best data that they can secure over the country. If any manufacturer has a flour that comes up to that standard, or nearest to that standard, naturally he would have an advantage. It is very probable that he would have an advantage, but it is right that he should have. That is what the public desire. If one flour is better than the other the public have a right to know that it is better than the other, and if——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I do not understand that there will be any one ready to speak on the unfinished business before 2 o'clock.

Mr. MORGAN. There are two or three.

Mr. CULLOM. I am up now for that purpose.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to me for one moment?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be taken up and considered without limitation of debate after the routine morning business until disposed of.

Mr. ALDRICH. I object.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I object.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall be obliged to object to that request unless it is fixed after Thursday, because I find a number of Senators desire to be heard on the canal bill, which, of course, is a very important matter. So I shall be compelled to ask the Senate to take up the bill immediately after the routine morning business.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I shall be pleased to except the canal bill or any bill in the line of appropriations that it may be desired to take up in the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] objected without any limitation.

Mr. BATE. And I object to continuing the discussion. Let the regular business be proceeded with.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I desire to give notice that after the routine morning business to-morrow morning I shall ask that the pure-food bill be considered.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Mr. MALLORY. Before the Senator from Illinois proceeds I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. I ask that it be read and printed. It is very brief.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 4, after the words "Sec. 4," strike out all down to and including the word "terms," in line 9, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That should the President be unable, within six months after the approval of this act, to obtain for the United States, on reasonable terms, a satisfactory title to the property of the New Panama Canal Company and such control of and jurisdiction over the necessary territory of the Republic of Colombia, mentioned in sections 1 and 2 of this act, including the right to perpetually maintain and operate the Panama Railroad.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I venture to give my views upon this subject with some degree of hesitation, first, because I dislike very greatly to differ with the distinguished Senator from Alabama, who for many years has been giving especial attention to the great question of securing an isthmian canal connecting the two oceans; and second, I have not forgotten that in 1894 I had the honor to deliver a brief address in this Senate in favor of what was then the only route that was considered, namely, the Nicaraguan route. I favored the construction of the canal through Nicaragua, not because I believed it was the best route that could be secured for such a canal, but because at that time it seemed to be the only practicable route over which the United States could construct the canal.

The Panama route was not then under discussion or consideration. A private French corporation had long before secured concessions from Colombia for the construction of a Panama canal, and such canal was actually being excavated. I did not suppose then, and do not think now, it would have been possible for the United States to have purchased the rights and concessions of the French corporation. Hence, as I have stated, there was only one available route over which the United States could construct a canal. So, Mr. President, with this explanation, I do not feel embarrassed by the fact that I advocated the Nicaragua route in 1894, and that I am now of the opinion that the Panama route is the most feasible one. If for any reason it is found that we can not secure a satisfactory title to the Panama route, then I am in favor of constructing the canal through Nicaragua.

I shall now proceed to the discussion of the question as to which of these routes we shall adopt. We are brought face to face at last with the proposition whether we will construct a canal at all, as both routes are now at our disposal and there is no longer excuse for delay.

QUESTION NOT A POLITICAL ONE.

Both political parties have indorsed the great work of constructing an isthmian canal. The Democratic party, in national convention assembled, indorsed the Nicaraguan route. The Republican party at its last national convention favored the construction of an isthmian canal. There is therefore no partisanship involved in this question. We are to perform a deliberate and unbiased duty in determining, in the interest of the success of the canal and in the interest of the American people, which route shall be selected.

HISTORY OF THE PROPOSED ISTHMIAN CANAL.

For years following the discovery of America it was thought that there was a natural strait across the Isthmus connecting the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. Columbus searched for such a strait and died in the belief that it existed, and until 1540, so generally was it believed that there was a natural waterway connecting the Atlantic and Pacific oceans through Central America, that it was so represented on all maps of the Western Hemisphere. Charles V of Spain early recommended to the Cortes the investigation of the Panama country with a view to the construction of a ship canal, but under his successor, Philip II of Spain, all efforts looking to the construction of a ship canal were abandoned, as Philip believed that the natural barrier was placed there by God and should not be removed by man. After Latin America threw off the yoke of Spanish rule, Bolivar, in 1825, took steps to have the Isthmus of Panama surveyed for the construction of a canal. The Panama route, over which it is now proposed to construct the canal, soon became an important highway of commerce, and has continued to be such for more than 400 years.

The United States early took an interest in an interoceanic canal. So far back as 1825 the subject was considered by that great statesman Henry Clay, then Secretary of State. The Republic of Central America first entered into a contract for the construction of a canal with an American citizen, A. H. Palmer, of New York, but Palmer was unable to raise the funds and the contract lapsed. In 1835 it was suggested by Central America that the United States construct the canal, and Presidents Jackson and Van Buren sent agents to Central America for the purpose of investigating possible routes, but without result.

In 1846 a treaty was entered into with New Granada (Colombia), which secured for the United States the right of transit across the Isthmus, and by which the United States guaranteed the neutrality of the Isthmus and of the canal if constructed.

In 1849 a concession was granted by the Nicaraguan Government, known as the Vanderbilt concession, to certain citizens of the United States for the construction of the canal, which was afterwards abrogated; but it was on account of this concession and certain claims of Great Britain to the territory at the terminus of the proposed canal which led to the signing of the old Clayton-Bulwer treaty of April 19, 1850, between the United States and Great Britain, by which the signatory parties joined in guaranteeing the neutrality of the canal when constructed by private capital. That treaty remained in full force and effect until the present session of Congress, when it was formally abrogated by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. For more than half a century the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, negotiated with the belief that the canal would soon be constructed, proved an effective barrier against the construction of such a canal. Different attempts were made to abrogate it. By many it was thought not to be binding upon the United States, but these questions were happily set at rest by the ratification of the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

The Vanderbilt contract was in 1856 revoked because of noncompliance with its terms.

In 1848 New Granada entered into a contract with the Panama Railway Company, under which contract the Panama Railroad was constructed across the Isthmus, and was put in operation in 1855.

General Grant, in 1869, in his first annual message to Congress, called attention to the subject of an interoceanic canal connecting the Atlantic and Pacific oceans through the Isthmus of Darien, and stated that instructions had been given to our minister to Colombia to obtain authority for a survey by this Government, in order to determine the practicability of such an undertaking, and a charter for the right of way to build by private enterprise such a work, if the surveys proved it to be practicable. Further explorations were made, and in 1872, pursuant to a resolution of Congress, the President appointed an interoceanic canal commission, which spent some years in investigation, and finally, in 1876, reported in favor of the Nicaraguan route. As usual, however, no action was taken by Congress upon the report.

Under the Administration of President Arthur a treaty was negotiated with Nicaragua for the construction of the canal by and at the sole cost of the United States through Nicaragua. This treaty was in direct conflict with the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It was not ratified during the Arthur Administration, and was immediately withdrawn by President Cleveland for reexamination, and in his first annual message to Congress he stated that he would not resubmit it to the Senate, stating, in part:

> Maintaining, as I do, the tenets of a line of precedents from Washington's day, which proscribe entangling alliances with foreign states, I do not favor a policy of acquisition of new and distant territory or the incorporation of remote interests with our own. * * *
> Therefore I am unable to recommend propositions involving paramount privileges of ownership or right outside of our own territory when coupled with absolute and unlimited engagements to defend the territorial integrity of the state where such interests lie. While the general project of connecting the two oceans by means of a canal is to be encouraged, I am of the opinion that any scheme to that end, to be considered with favor, should be free from the features alluded to.
> Whatever highway may be constructed across the barrier dividing the two greatest maritime areas of the world must be for the world's benefit—a trust for mankind, to be removed from the chance of domination by any single power, nor become a point of invitation for hostilities or a prize for warlike ambition. An engagement combining the construction, ownership, and operation of such a work by this Government, with an offensive and defensive alliance for its protection with the foreign state whose responsibilities and rights we would share, is, in my judgment, inconsistent with such dedication to universal and neutral use, and would, moreover, entail measures for its realization beyond the scope of our national policy or present means.

The Maritime Canal Company obtained concessions from Nicaragua for the construction of the canal, and that company was incorporated by act of Congress of February 20, 1889, and in June, 1889, the preliminary work for the construction of the canal was commenced by the Nicaragua Canal Construction Company, a Colorado corporation, who had entered into a contract with the Maritime Canal Company for the completion of the Nicaragua Canal. A couple of million dollars was spent by the company, but finally in 1893 the work was abandoned and the property forfeited to the Government of Nicaragua under the terms of its contract. Congress had been appealed to for aid by this company, and bills to that end were considered by Congress, but never became laws.

However, on March 2, 1895, an appropriation of $20,000 was made for the purpose of ascertaining the feasibility and cost of the construction and completion of the Nicaragua Canal. A board of three engineers was constituted by this act, to be appointed by the President, one from the Corps of Engineers of the Army, one from the Navy, and a civil engineer from private life, to make the surveys and examination necessary for such ascertainment. Said board was personally to visit Nicaragua, and make its report before November 1, 1895. The President appointed Colonel Ludlow, Civil Engineer Endicott, and Alfred Noble a board of engineers to make the investigation.

On October 31, 1895, this Nicaragua Canal Board submitted its report, which contains much valuable information and a large number of profiles of the proposed route, but which recommends that further investigations should be made, as, owing to the lack of funds and the short length of time at the disposal of the Board, a complete and thorough investigation was not possible; that for obtaining the necessary data for the formation of a final project eighteen months' time, covering two dry seasons, and an expenditure of $350,000 "will be required."

On June 4, 1897, $150,000 were appropriated for the purpose of continuing surveys and examinations of the Nicaragua route, and the President was authorized to appoint a commission, consisting of one engineer from the Corps of Engineers, one naval officer, and one engineer from civil life, to complete plans for the entire work of the construction of such Nicaragua Canal.

The President appointed as members of this Nicaragua Canal Commission Rear-Admiral Walker, Col. O. M. Carter (succeeded by Colonel Hains), and Prof. L. M. Haupt.

This Commission made its report on May 9, 1899, in which they concluded as follows:

> After giving due weight to all the elements of this important question, and with an earnest desire to reach logical conclusions, based upon substantial facts, the Commission believes that a canal can be built across the Isthmus on this route for a sum not exceeding that stated in the estimate.

Namely, $118,000,000. Professor Haupt estimated that it would cost $134,818,308.

It must be remembered that neither the Nicaragua Canal Board of 1895 nor the Nicaragua Canal Commission of 1897 were appointed to consider the Panama route. These Commissions were appointed for the purpose of reporting as to the Nicaragua route.

In 1899 the present Isthmian Canal Commission was appointed, under and by virtue of an act of Congress, to investigate both the Panama and Nicaragua routes; to which Commission and its report and recommendations I shall refer at length hereafter.

PENDING MEASURES FOR THE CONSTRUCTION OF THE CANAL.

There are three propositions now pending before the Senate for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

The first bill, being the so-called Hepburn bill, which has twice passed the House, and has been favorably reported by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals of the Senate. This bill authorizes the President to acquire from the States of Costa Rica and Nicaragua control of such portions of territory as may be desirable and necessary on which to excavate and construct a canal from a point near Greytown, in the Caribbean Sea, via Lake Nicaragua, to Brito, on the Pacific Ocean, and appropriates $10,000,000 toward the project therein contemplated. This is the Nicaraguan canal bill.

The second bill is in form an amendment or substitute for the Hepburn-Morgan bill, having been introduced by the senior Senator from Wisconsin, and has been considered and reported adversely by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. This amendment strikes out all after the enacting clause of the Hepburn-Morgan bill and authorizes the President to acquire, at a cost of $40,000,000, all property, etc., of the Panama Canal Company, of France, etc., providing a satisfactory title to said property can be obtained. It also authorized the President to acquire from Colombia, upon such terms as he may deem reasonable, control of sufficient territory for the construction of the canal. It then provides that the President shall direct the Secretary of War to excavate and construct, utilizing to that end, so far as practicable, the work heretofore done by the New Panama Canal Company, of France, a ship canal over what is known as the Panama route.

Section 4 provides that if the President is unable to obtain for the United States a satisfactory title to the property of the Panama Canal Company, and such control of the territory from the Republic of Colombia within a reasonable time and upon reasonable terms, that the President, after having first obtained similar control of the necessary territory from Costa Rica and Nicaragua for the construction of the canal, shall direct the Secretary of War to excavate and construct a ship canal over what is known as the Nicaragua route.

The third bill, which has been introduced as a substitute for the Spooner amendment by the senior Senator from Massachusetts, directs the President to cause to be excavated a canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific oceans by such route as may be selected by him, giving him authority to employ such agencies and obtain such advice as he shall find necessary, etc., and appropriating $10,000,000 to carry out the project therein contemplated.

This third bill gives to the President the whole discretion in the selection of a route. It gives to him more than executive authority. It confers upon him a power which should be exercised by Congress alone. The President, with this great responsibility upon him, would be very slow in making a selection. He would be called upon to consider routes which are no longer seriously considered. After years of investigation, I think all necessary information is now before Congress to enable us to make a proper selection. The Nicaragua and the Panama routes are now the only ones thought to be practicable. Congress should not shirk its responsibility. The time of the Executive is already sufficiently occupied with duties properly and legitimately executive, and to throw this great responsibility of the selection of a route for the construction of a canal costing $200,000,000, and possibly more, would be unfair to the Executive, and would be giving him responsibility which he has not sought and does not desire.

If the Spooner substitute is adopted the President will have placed upon him the responsibility of seeing to it that the Panama Canal Company conveys to the United States a satisfactory title and the making of a treaty with Colombia, securing to the United States the control of the necessary territory, which is as much responsibility and discretion as the President should be called upon to exercise, and any treaty negotiated by the President will be sent to the Senate for its consideration, touching the matters of jurisdiction and the zone of territory through which the canal may run.

The bill which passed the House, providing for the construction of the canal via the Nicaragua route, and the Spooner substitute, providing first for the construction of the canal via the Panama route, and if that is not practicable, then via the Nicaragua route, are now under consideration.

THE TWO ROUTES.

It seems to be pretty well settled that the Nicaragua and Panama are the only practicable routes for the construction of an interoceanic canal. There is much to be said in favor of both routes. We have for so many years been of the opinion that it would be impossible for the United States to secure title to the Panama route (that route having been in the hands of a private French corporation) that we had ceased giving the Panama any attention, and the popular idea has been the canal via Nicaragua and Costa Rica, and hence we have all, perhaps, been a little prejudiced in favor of Nicaragua.

I believe there are many convincing reasons why the Spooner substitute should be passed, and why the canal should be constructed over the Panama route, if a good title can be obtained from the Panama Canal Company and the Government of Colombia. The principal reason on which I base my preference for the Panama route is the recommendation and reports of the recent Isthmian Canal Commission.

THE PANAMA ROUTE AND THE REPORTS OF THE COMMISSION.

Many measures have been considered by Congress looking to the construction of an isthmian canal via the Nicaragua route, either at the sole cost of the United States or by Government aid to private individuals. It was not until 1899, however, that any plan for a thorough investigation of both the Panama and Nicaragua routes was provided. In that year an item was inserted in the river and harbor appropriation bill appropriating $1,000,000, to be disbursed under the order of the President, for the purpose of defraying the necessary expenses of a complete investigation of any and all practicable routes for a canal across the Isthmus of Panama, particularly to investigate the two routes known, respectively, as the Nicaragua route and the Panama route, with a view of determining the most practicable and feasible route for such canal, together with the approximate and proper cost of constructing a canal. On the 10th day of June, 1899, the President appointed Rear-Admiral Walker; Lieutenant-Colonel Ernst; Colonel Hains; Civil Engineers Haupt, Noble, and Burr; Hon. Samuel Pasco; Prof. Emory R. Johnson, and Lieut. Commander S. A. Staunton a commission to investigate the various routes across the Isthmus, pursuant to the provisions of this act.

The Commission entered upon its duties immediately, and on November 30, 1900, made its preliminary report to the President. I shall refer to these reports seriatim, as I come to them. The work was divided by the Commission into an investigation of (1) the Nicaragua route; (2) the Panama route; (3) other possible routes; (4) the industrial, commercial, and military value of an interoceanic canal; (5) rights, privileges, and franchises. Thirty-one working parties were organized and sent into the field, 20 into Nicaragua with about 150 engineers and assistants, 5 into Panama with about 20 engineers and assistants, and 6 into the Darien country with about 50 engineers and assistants, making a force of about 250 sent from the United States, besides about 600 laborers and others employed in the different countries.

The Commission studied the reports and other writings upon the Nicaraguan route, visited Paris for the purpose of making a thorough study of all the details, maps, profiles, etc., of the Panama Canal scheme from its inception, visited the Kiel Canal, Germany, the North Sea Canal, Holland, the Manchester Canal, England, for the purpose of studying those canals. The Commission then visited Central America and reviewed the work done by the Maritime Canal Company, which at one time commenced the construction of the Nicaraguan Canal, and actually excavated about one-fourth of a mile, but finally abandoned the entire work and forfeited the property to the Nicaraguan Government. The Commission visited Panama and inspected the work of the Panama Canal Company. They found about 2,000 workmen engaged in the excavation of the Panama Canal, and found a railroad in full operation, which they valued at $7,000,000. The Commission visited other possible routes in the Darien country, but concluded that the Panama and Nicaragua were the only feasible routes. The preliminary report concludes:

The estimated cost of building the Nicaragua Canal is about $58,000,000 more than that of completing the Panama Canal, leaving out the cost of acquiring the latter property * * *

The New Panama Canal Company has shown no disposition to sell its property to the United States. Should that company be able and willing to sell, there is reason to believe that the price would not be such as would make the total cost to the United States less than that of the Nicaragua Canal.

II. The Panama Canal after completion would be shorter, have fewer locks, and less curvature than the Nicaragua Canal. The measure of these advantages is the time required for a vessel to pass through, which is estimated for an average ship at twelve hours for Panama and thirty-three hours for Nicaragua.

On the other hand, the distance from San Francisco to New York is 377 miles, to New Orleans 579 miles, and to Liverpool 386 miles greater via Panama than via Nicaragua. The time required to pass over these distances being greater than the difference in the time of transit through the canals, the Nicaragua line after completion would be somewhat the more advantageous of the two to the United States, notwithstanding the greater cost of maintaining the longer canal.

III. The Government of Colombia, in which lies the Panama Canal, has granted an exclusive concession, which still has many years to run. It is not free to grant the necessary rights to the United States, except upon condition that an agreement be reached with the New Panama Canal Company. The Commission believes that such agreement is impracticable. So far as can be ascertained the company is not willing to sell its franchise, but it will allow the United States to become the owner of part of its stock. The Commission considers such an arrangement inadmissible.

The Governments of Nicaragua and Costa Rica, on the other hand, are untrammeled by concessions and are free to grant to the United States such privilege as may be mutually agreed upon.

In view of all the facts, and particularly in view of all the difficulties of obtaining the necessary rights, privileges, and franchises on the Panama route, and assuming that Nicaragua and Costa Rica recognize the value of the canal to themselves and are prepared to grant concessions on terms which are reasonable and acceptable to the United States, the Commission is of the opinion that "the most practicable and feasible route for an isthmian canal, to be under the control, management, and ownership of the United States, is that known as the Nicaraguan route."

This is the first report made by this commission of nine.

Mr. MITCHELL. They made their report in 1899.

Mr. CULLOM. They made their report in 1899, I think.

Mr. MITCHELL. A preliminary report.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes; a preliminary report in favor of the Nicaragua route. I want it distinctly understood that from reading all these separate reports the Commission was all the time under the impression that they could not get the Panama Canal on reasonable terms.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAIRBANKS in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. The question of the price at which the Panama concern could be bought, it seems to me, does not cut any figure in determining the question as to which is the better route.

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly not.

Mr. STEWART. What authority had this Commission to negotiate with either of the Governments through whose territory the canal would pass, or with the Panama Company? I thought they were to examine the routes and give us the engineering facts. I do not like their diplomatic reports. They seem to me to be bunglesome.

Mr. CULLOM. The Commission were not negotiating. They were simply endeavoring to ascertain, as they did finally ascertain, the fact that the Panama Canal Company was willing to sell out at a price which they thought the Government of the United States ought to give.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I will ask the Senator from Illinois if in the act authorizing this Commission it was not expressly provided, among other things, that it should ascertain the price at which the Panama Canal could be purchased?

Mr. CULLOM. Unquestionably. It was the duty of the Commission to run down every fact connected with both routes, and this they did.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is nothing in the act and nothing in the instructions of the President which authorized them to negotiate with the Panama Canal Company.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I will ask the Senator from Oregon, if the Senator from Illinois will allow me, if one of the essential facts in determining the cost of constructing the canal would not be the price at which the work already done could be obtained from the Panama Canal Company?

Mr. CULLOM. The Commission could do nothing about it unless they could come to some definite understanding as to what they could get the property for; otherwise their whole mission, so far as one route was concerned, would have been a failure.

On November 16, 1901, the Commission made its second report to the President. This report is a most minute one, covering all the phases of an interoceanic canal. The Commission again recommended the Nicaraguan route as the most feasible as the situation actually stood then. But we must examine these conclusions to see why that route was recommended.

The Commission, in this report, concluded that the selection of the most feasible and practicable route must be made between Nicaragua and Panama. It reviewed the water-supply features, and concluded that they were satisfactory on both lines; that it would be necessary to construct a dam to obtain a sea level on both routes, and that both dams were practicable; that the present transportation facilities were inadequate on the Nicaragua route, while there was a railroad now in operation along the entire length of the Panama route; that there were no harbors at either end of Nicaragua, while there are such harbors at both ends of Panama; that, although with the completion of the harbors as planned one route would have little the advantage of the other, the chances are in favor of Panama; that, owing to the absence of harbors and railroads, the period of preparation at Nicaragua would be twice that at Panama, namely two years. The Commission estimated that the Nicaragua Canal could be constructed in eight years, with probable delays, while the Panama Canal could be constructed in ten years, with less probability of delay.

I am giving, Mr. President, all the facts on both sides of this controversy as I gather them from the different reports. So far as I am concerned, I am not pleading especially for any particular route except as I seem to be led to do so by an examination of both sides of the question.

The entire length of the Nicaraguan route from sea to sea would be 183 miles, while the total length of the Panama route would be 49 miles. The cost of constructing the Nicaragua Canal would be $189,864,062, while the cost of constructing the Panama Canal would be $144,233,358. The estimated annual cost of maintenance and operation of the Nicaragua Canal would be $3,300,000, while the estimated annual cost of maintenance and operation of the Panama Canal would be two millions, or $1,300,000 annually less. The Panama route would be 134.57 miles shorter than the Nicaraguan route. The Panama route has less summit elevation for locks and 26.44 miles less curvature.

I want to say that I have been influenced in my conclusions and my judgment as to what I ought to do by the general proposition that the Panama Canal would be nearer the sea level than would the Nicaragua Canal, and the Panama Canal would have less curvature and would be only about one-fourth as long as a canal at Nicaragua. It has seemed to me that the shorter the canal was the surer the ships which had to use it would be to get through without accident. So putting these facts side by side, I could not resist the conclusion that it would be safer to build the canal at Panama.

The estimated time for vessels to pass through the Nicaraguan route is thirty-three hours, while for the Panama it is twelve hours.

My honorable friends say it takes longer to get to the entrance to the Panama Canal. That is true. You have the advantage on that score, as I have already shown. About a day could be saved by the Nicaragua over the Panama route between our Pacific and Atlantic ports, and two days between our Gulf ports and north Pacific ports. Between Atlantic ports and the west coast of South America the Panama route would be two days shorter, and between the Gulf ports and the west coast of South America the Panama route would be one day shorter. The construction of the Panama Canal would be along a highway of commerce in use for three hundred years, a railroad having been in operation more than fifty years. The construction of the canal via the Nicaragua route would be along a new route.

Existing conditions indicate hygienic advantages at Nicaragua, although equally effective sanitary measures must be taken in both cases. The Republics of Nicaragua and Costa Rica are untrammeled by existing conventions or treaty obligations, and are free to grant the United States the necessary concessions, while Colombia has already made concessions to the New Panama Canal Company, and if the canal is constructed via Panama these concessions must be removed before the United States could obtain proper title. The Commission stated that the total amount for which the Panama Canal Company offered to sell its canal property to the United States is $109,141,500, which would make the Panama Canal cost vastly more ($63,000,000) than the Nicaragua. The Commission estimated that the value of the Panama Canal Company's property was but $40,000,000. The Commission concludes its second report by saying:

> There are certain physical advantages * * * in favor of the Panama route, but the price fixed by the Panama Canal Company for sale of its property and franchises is so unreasonable that its acceptance can not be recommended by the Commission.
> After consideration of all the facts developed by the investigation made by the Commission and the actual situation as it now stands, and having in view the terms offered by the New Panama Canal Company, this Commission is of the opinion that the most practicable and feasible route for an isthmian canal is that known as the Nicaragua route.

This is the second finding in favor of the Nicaragua route.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] a few moments ago interrupted the Senator from Illinois and questioned the propriety of the Commission's negotiating for terms of purchase of the canal. I wish to read, bearing upon that point, just a paragraph of the act under which the Commission was appointed:

> And the President is further authorized to investigate and ascertain what rights, privileges, and franchises, if any, may be held and owned by any corporations, associations, or individuals, and what work, if any, has been done by such corporations, associations, or individuals in the construction of a canal at either or any of said routes, and particularly at the so-called Nicaragua and Panama routes, respectively; and likewise to ascertain the cost of purchasing all of the rights, privileges, and franchises held and owned by any such corporations, associations, and individuals in any and all of such routes, particularly the said Nicaraguan route and the said Panama route.

Mr. CULLOM. Unquestionably the authority was given to the Commission to do everything that could be done to find out in any way legally what the conditions surrounding each route were and which route, in their judgment, was the better.

On January 18, 1902, the Commission made its third report to the President, in which it communicated an offer by the Panama Canal Company to transfer all its property on the Isthmus and in Paris for $40,000,000. The Commission stated in reference to this offer:

> The advantages of the two canal routes have been restated. There has been no change in the views of the Commission with reference to any of these conclusions then reached, but the new proposition submitted by the New Panama Canal Company makes a reduction of nearly $70,000,000 in the cost of a canal across the Isthmus, and with this reduction a canal can be constructed at Panama for more than $5,500,000 less than through Nicaragua. The unreasonable sum asked for the property and rights of the New Panama Canal Company when the Commission reached its former conclusion overbalanced the advantages of that route, but now that the estimates by the two routes have been nearly equalized the Commission can form its judgment by weighing the advantages of each and determining which is the more practicable and feasible. * * * It must be assumed by the Commission that Colombia will exercise the same fairness and liberality if the Panama route is determined upon that have been expected of Nicaragua and Costa Rica.
> After considering the changed conditions that now exist and all the facts and circumstances upon which its present judgment must be based, the Commission is of the opinion that the most practicable and feasible route for an isthmian canal, to be under the control, management, and ownership of the United States is that known as the Panama route.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE COMMISSION HAVE NOT BEEN INCONSISTENT.

Now, Mr. President, I have quoted at length from the various reports of the Isthmian Canal Commission for the purpose of showing that the recommendations of that Commission have been perfectly consistent, and that the Commission has not "changed base," as is popularly supposed. In every report they clearly pointed out the advantages of the Panama route, but in the preliminary report the Panama Canal Company had shown no disposition to sell its property at all, and the Commission had to recommend the Nicaragua route. In the second report the canal company asked such an exorbitant price that the Commission could not recommend the Panama route over the Nicaragua route, when it would cost $60,000,000 more to build the canal by the Panama route. In the third report, when the Panama Canal Company offered to sell its property at the estimate which the Commission placed as its actual value, the Commission at once recommended the Panama as the most feasible and practicable route.

In addition, we have the sworn testimony of Commissioners Walker, Noble, Morison, Hains, Burr, and Ernst before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, stating substantially that the Panama route is the best, and that they would have recommended that route in their first and second reports had the Panama Canal Company offered to sell its property for $40,000,000 in the first place.

Admiral Walker said:

> I think that the engineering features of the Panama route are better than those of the Nicaragua route, although both routes are feasible. I think if the French company had come forward with a direct offer and a reasonable offer for their property, the report itself would have been in favor of the Panama route.

Commissioner Noble said:

> On the basis of equal cost of the two routes, my preference would be for the Panama Canal.

Commissioner Morison said:

> Well, I can only speak for myself in that respect. I never should have signed any report recommending the Nicaragua route in preference to the Panama route except on the ground that I felt that the United States could not afford to be held up by a French organization.

Commissioner Hains said:

> If it had been a question of mere practicability and feasibility, uncoupled with anything else, I should have said that the Panama route was the most feasible; but coupled with this other condition, and seeing no prospect of getting a transfer, my idea was that the only practicable route was the Nicaragua route.

SANITARY CONDITIONS OF PANAMA.

It has been stated that the Panama route is "unhealthy," and that the completion of the canal via that route will result in terrible loss of life. But the testimony of members of the Isthmian Canal Commission does not entirely substantiate that statement. Admiral Walker testified that, while there was great loss of life in building the Panama railroad, and when they first went to work on the canal there was a good deal of sickness, the surface material from which this sickness is supposed to come has been largely removed, and of late years it is as healthy as anywhere in a tropical country; that as it stands to-day Nicaragua is a healthier route because there is no work of that kind being done and very few people to get sick, but when you get to turning up the ground there will be sickness there, as there would be anywhere.

Commissioner Noble testified:

> As far as present conditions are concerned—that is, present sanitary conditions—I think the advantage is altogether in favor of Nicaragua. When work is undertaken on either route the conditions will be less favorable, owing to the stirring up of the mud in the swamps and the soil; stirring up the soil anywhere increases the sickness beyond doubt. I should think that as the unfavorable conditions developed the aggravation would be greater, perhaps, in Nicaragua than in Panama, and what the total result would be under the new conditions I am not by any means certain, though I think the advantage would still be with Nicaragua.

Commissioner Morison:

> I think the diseases at Panama are very largely due to artificial conditions. The Isthmus of Panama has always been an unhealthy place. It has been inhabited for four hundred years, and I think you may say that there is not a water pipe or sewer on the whole Isthmus. * * * I think we know now how to handle the sanitary conditions at Panama. The first thing to do on the Isthmus is to get a supply of good water, and next dispose of sewage. With these two conditions met, three-fourths of the sickness on the Isthmus will disappear.

Commissioner Burr:

> I do not think there is any difference between the two routes (so far as health conditions are concerned) that is sensible. There is at Panama a great deal of sickness, but this is a line of continuous population from one ocean to the other. * * * On the Nicaragua route there is nobody there to be sick. * * * I believe that if a large force of laborers were put upon the Nicaragua Canal for its construction, and there were brought into that country the seeds of disease that have been brought into Panama, there would be practically the same conditions to deal with at one place as in the other. It is equally malarial, naturally. The death rate of Nicaragua at Managua and other towns is appallingly high.

VOLCANOES AND EARTHQUAKES.

But there is another material fact why the Panama route should be selected, and that is the danger to the canal, if constructed through Nicaragua, from volcanoes. The terrible lesson which we have witnessed in the recent destruction of St. Pierre, by a volcano long supposed to be extinct, will not soon be forgotten by the world. There are said to be many volcanoes in the vicinity of the Nicaragua route, most of them supposed to be extinct. The fact is the whole Isthmus between North and South America is a volcanic region—perhaps the most noted volcanic region in the world. There are three volcanoes in Lake Nicaragua itself, one or two of which are still said to be active. As I understand it, there are no volcanoes near enough to the Panama route to be considered dangerous. These volcanoes within the vicinity of Nicaragua, or in Lake Nicaragua, may never become actively destructive, and again they may. This is not within human knowledge to foretell. But the fact that there are one or two active volcanoes in Lake Nicaragua should have very great weight in the selection of the Panama route.

Both Nicaragua and Panama are subject to earthquakes, but in neither country has any great destruction resulted from them. The Isthmian Canal Commission concludes that there is very little danger from earthquakes, the works of the canal being underground, the dams being low, with broad and massive foundations.

The dangers from volcanoes and earthquakes are of course merely speculative. In either route there seems to be danger from earthquakes; but by selecting the Panama route we can, at least, avoid the possible danger from volcanoes. However, if it is found that we can not obtain a good title from the Panama Canal Company or the Government of Colombia, we will go ahead with the construction of the canal along the Nicaragua route, and take whatever risk there may be from volcanoes. The two routes being equally dangerous in some respects, the whole country being a volcanic region, we should first attempt to construct so great a work in the least dangerous portion of a dangerous country.

CONGRESS SHOULD BE GOVERNED BY RECOMMENDATION OF COMMISSION.

Mr. President, it seems to me that our action in the selection of a route should rest largely with the recommendation and report of the Isthmian Canal Commission. I confess that if I myself believed the Nicaragua route was the better, I should hesitate very greatly before I would throw my judgment against that of a commission composed of such men as reported in this case. The integrity of the members of that Commission has not and can not be successfully questioned. Among the members of the Commission are able and experienced engineers and Army officers, selected by the late President, not on account of any political reasons, but on account of their ability alone, having no possible interest in any particular route.

That Commission was created by act of Congress to make this investigation and report. We appropriated a million dollars to secure that investigation and report. That Commission has spent more than two years in making as thorough an investigation of the Isthmus, and of both the Nicaragua and Panama routes, as it was possible to make. That Commission has made a unanimous report in favor of the Panama route, and I can not see how Congress can now very consistently select any other route, especially when that report and recommendation are sustained by convincing and unanswerable reasons.

THE PANAMA ROUTE SHOULD BE SELECTED.

We are called upon to choose between a route 183 miles long and one 49 miles long; between a route costing $189,000,000 and one costing one hundred and eighty-four millions; between a route which will annually cost $3,300,000 to operate and maintain and one that will cost two millions to operate and maintain; between a route that will take but twelve hours to navigate and one that will take thirty-three hours; between a route that has been a highway of commerce for three hundred years and one that has never been used; between a route the entire length of which there is now in operation a ralroad worth $7,000,000 and a route with no transportation facilities.

I think, Mr. President, for all these reasons, that the Panama route should be selected.

Now, Mr. President, I have gone over the reasons why I think the Panama route is preferable to the Nicaragua route. Notwithstanding, however, any superiority which Panama possesses over Nicaragua, there remain two absolute conditions which must be complied with to the entire satisfaction of the United States before the Panama route is finally selected, even if Congress shall legislate in favor of the Panama route. These two conditions are:

I. The Panama Canal Company must convey to the United States a satisfactory title.

II. A convention must be entered into with Colombia giving to the United States permission to construct the canal through Panama, and a satisfactory control of it when constructed.

If either of these conditions can not be complied with the Panama route should be rejected.

TITLE OF THE PANAMA CANAL COMPANY.

As to the first condition, namely, the conveyance of a satisfactory title to the United States by the Panama Company, the Panama Canal Company must not only do this, but it must be made absolutely sure at the same time that there can be no possible legal right for a claim on the part of the stockholders of either the old or new Panama Canal Company against the United States on account of the transfer of the property of that company to the United States. I wish to emphasize that statement. So far as I am concerned I want it distinctly understood that whatever route we agree upon there must not be, if I can help it, any future trouble in reference to it. We must have a clear title and must not be annoyed for the next hundred years by claims from Paris or anywhere else.

I assume that the Panama Canal Company can convey a satisfactory title to its property to the United States. The title of the Panama Canal Company has been very elaborately discussed in the report of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals of the Senate. The majority of the committee argued that the Panama Canal Company can not convey a satisfactory title to the United States, while the minority maintained that it can.

I do not think it is necessary that we should enter into a discussion of that question now, because if the Spooner amendment is adopted, that title, whatever it may be, will be given a close, careful, and exhaustive examination by the responsible law officers of the Government before the offer of the Panama Canal Company is accepted. If the title is found not to be satisfactory for any reason whatever (and this is left largely within the discretion of the President), then the offer of the Panama Canal Company will be rejected and the President will direct that the canal be constructed by the Nicaragua route, providing, of course, a satisfactory arrangement can be made with Nicaragua.

PROPOSED TREATY WITH COLOMBIA.

As to the second condition, namely, a satisfactory treaty with Colombia, I desire to say generally that the country through which this canal is constructed, whether it be Panama or Nicaragua and Costa Rica, must give to the United States such jurisdiction and control over the zone of territory through which the canal shall run as will positively preclude any interference or control by either of those countries. The United States must have the control and protection of its canal.

I do not apprehend that there will be much difficulty about securing a satisfactory treaty with Colombia. The relationship between the United States and Colombia has always been exceptionally friendly. By the treaty of commerce of 1846 between the United States and Colombia, the United States was given the right of transit across the Isthmus of Panama upon any modes of communication then in operation or that might thereafter be constructed, including a canal, if such a work should be constructed, on the same terms and conditions as citizens of Colombia, or New Granada, as it then was. The United States, by this convention, guaranteed the neutrality of the Isthmus and the canal, should one be constructed.

Colombia has recently signified its willingness to grant the most liberal concessions to the United States.

In a note to the Secretary of State, dated March 31, 1902, the Colombian minister, speaking in behalf of his Government, assures us that—

> If the people of the United States evince an earnest desire that their Government apply its energy and Treasury to the completion of the canal, Colombia not only will not place any obstacle whatever in the way of such a purpose or keep her concessions within the bounds of those previously conceded to private enterprise, but will enlarge those concessions to such an extent as to renounce a demand for the ownership after the lapse of a number of years of operation, as stipulated in the French company's contract; she will grant the use of a much more extensive zone than that originally conceded for the execution of the work; extend facilities in all the ports of the Republic for cooperation in the work of the enterprise, relinquish her proprietary and usufructary rights in the Panama Railway, and, lastly, forego a fixed participation in the proceeds of the canal, confining her demands to fee of annuity for the price of the zone, the revenues of the railway and the heavier expenses put upon the public administration in the Isthmus by the increase of population and the traffic consequent to the work on the canal itself.

The minister from Colombia has submitted a memorandum of points to be embodied in a convention for the construction and management of the canal.

That proposed convention stipulates for the transfer of the property of the New Panama Canal Company to the United States. It provides that the United States shall have the exclusive right to excavate, construct, maintain, operate, control, and protect a maritime canal, and also the same rights for the construction, maintenance, operation, control, and protection of railway, telegraph, and telephone lines, canals, dikes, dams, reservoirs, and such other auxiliary works as may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, protection, and operation of the canal. It gives to the United States the use of a zone of territory along the route of the canal, 5 kilometers in width on either side thereof, for a term of one hundred years, renewable at the option of the United States for periods of similar duration.

I shall not go over in detail this memorandum. If we find that it is not correct in all its details, and that it will in any way hamper the United States in our control and protection of the canal, we can amend it; and whatever those amendments may be, if they are reasonable and fair, I do not believe we will have any difficulty in inducing Colombia to accept.

As was stated in the letter of William Nelson Cromwell, general counsel for the New Panama Canal Company, speaking for the minister of Colombia in reference to the proposed convention:

But Colombia is in the dark as to the precise desires and needs of the United States upon the subject, and Minister Concha can not, of course, anticipate in his first statement all the reasonable requirements of this Government. He wishes, however, to manifest in the most hearty manner, the desire of his Government to facilitate the purposes of the United States, and this disposition is manifested by the comprehensive convention which he has this day submitted to you, but not as an ultimatum.

The United States, in my opinion, will have very little trouble in securing practically any reasonable concessions that we may desire from Colombia. Colombia, of course, wants an interoceanic canal constructed through Panama, and she certainly must appreciate now that she can never hope to obtain such a canal until a great country like the United States, with unlimited capital at its disposal, shall undertake to construct it. It is therefore to her interest to give the United States all the concessions we may desire, and we shall certainly never spend these millions of dollars unless we can obtain a treaty satisfactory in every respect.

PROPOSED TREATIES WITH NICARAGUA AND COSTA RICA.

Protocols between the United States and Nicaragua and Costa Rica were signed on December 1, 1900, by which Costa Rica and Nicaragua, respectively, agreed with the United States to enter into negotiations with the United States to settle the plan and the agreements in detail found necessary to accomplish the construction of a ship canal via Costa Rica and Nicaragua, and to provide for the ownership of said canal when the President of the United States is authorized by law to acquire control of such portion of the territory of Nicaragua and Costa Rica, respectively, as may be necessary on which to construct such a ship canal. These protocols were signed when the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was pending in the Senate, and both provide that the course of said canal and the terminals thereof shall be the same that were stated in that treaty. A draft of a proposed convention with Nicaragua has been agreed to, and is found in a report submitted by the Senator from Alabama on May 26, 1902.

By this proposed convention with Nicaragua, the United States is leased in perpetuity the exclusive right to construct, own, and operate a ship canal through the territory of Nicaragua, and the United States guarantees in perpetuity the sovereignty, independence, and territorial integrity of the Republic of Nicaragua.

If the canal is constructed over the Nicaragua route, the United States will be obligated to pay to Nicaragua $6,000,000 in cash, and an annual rental of $25,000 in gold for the possession of the territory perpetually leased.

In addition to this, it appears from an extract of a message from the President of Costa Rica that the United States must pay to Costa Rica in cash $1,500,000 for the use of such portion of the territory of that country for canal purposes (whether we will be required to pay rent thereafter does not appear), and that Costa Rica will have to amend her constitution before she can enter into the proposed treaty with the United States. Costa Rica is, therefore, not in a position to enter into treaty with the United States, and may not be able to amend her constitution for several years, if at all.

From a report presented by the Senator from Alabama, it would appear that we will have to pay Costa Rica $1,000,000, and $10,000 annually as rent.

COMPARISON OF RENT TO BE PAID BY THE UNITED STATES.

So, Mr. President, if the canal is constructed over the Nicaragua route, we must pay immediately in cash $7,500,000 to Nicaragua and Costa Rica and $25,000 annually to Nicaragua, and perhaps some rent to Costa Rica.

If the canal is constructed by the Panama route, it appears from the proposed convention with Panama that we will immediately be obliged to pay to Colombia $7,000,000 in cash, and fourteen years thereafter a fair and reasonable annuity. In other words, we must pay $7,000,000 in cash, no rent for fourteen years, and thereafter a fair and reasonable annuity, to be agreed upon three years before the expiration of said fourteen years, said annual rental to be fixed once in each one hundred years. If the parties are unable to agree as to said annuity it is to be determined by arbitration. The proposed treaty with Colombia further provides:

In fixing this fair and reasonable annuity there shall be taken into consideration the present price of the usufruct of the railway as well as the compensation that is to be stipulated for the use of the zone and for the additional administrative expenses that the construction of the canal will impose upon Colombia, and also the advanced payment of $7,000,000, and the comparative cost and conditions upon which the United States reasonably could have expected to acquire concessions satisfactory to it in respect of any other canal route.

So, Mr. President, if we accept the Panama route, our first payment will be $500,000 less than if we accept the Nicaragua route. What will be our annual rental for the use of the Panama territory can not now be determined, but the conditions of the proposed treaty with Colombia are such that we are amply protected against being compelled to pay an unreasonable or exorbitant rent.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. Has the Senator taken into consideration the necessity also for supplying the cities of Panama and Colon with waterworks, which is required by the Colombian Government?

Mr. CULLOM. I believe the suggestion of a treaty requires that, and if we should agree to it it might cost us something additional. But all this, so far as an absolute agreement is concerned, will be for future consideration, first, by the President and the Administration in making the agreement, and after that it will come to the Senate for consideration and approval or amendment, as we see proper. I merely narrate the cash payments——

Mr. HARRIS. The other is immediately contemplated.

Mr. CULLOM. The other, of course, would come in for consideration, and I have no doubt if it should be agreed that we should supply those cities with water it would be a very easy thing to do with our facilities.

Mr. HARRIS. It is not at all any easy thing.

Mr. CULLOM. It is not an easy thing? The Senator from Kansas is an engineer and has been upon the property, and I have not. I supposed it would not be a difficult thing, but whatever it is, if it is agreed to by the Government, we will adhere to it.

I assume that we will have to pay greater annual rent for the Panama route than for the Nicaragua, but in this connection we must not lose sight of the fact that it will cost us annully $1,300,000 more to operate and maintain the canal via Nicaragua than via Panama.

CONCLUSION.

For the reasons I have given I am in favor of the adoption of the SPOONER amendment, which insures the construction of the isthmian canal, first, by the route that I believe to be the best one, namely, the Panama, and if not via that route then by the only available remaining route, the Nicaragua.

Mr. President, I have given my views in connection with the historical statement of facts in relation to the canal. I have done it not as a partisan of one line or the other. I merely assert as my conclusion, which will govern the casting of my vote, that we are safer in adopting the Panama route than we would be in adopting the other, because you will get a shorter route, less liable to become involved or in trouble; and it is more feasible for vessels to go through the Panama route, because it will take so little time to get through. Altogether, it seems to me that we ought to adopt that route.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss the relative merits of the Panama and Nicaragua routes. The fact that the Isthmian Canal Commission unanimously recommended the adoption of the Panama route presents an argument unanswered and unanswerable. This recommendation covers all matters of construction, including the Bohio Dam, which the Senator from Kansas has seen fit to criticise. Nor is it my purpose to discuss, at this time, at any rate, the legal questions involved in the title of the New Panama Canal Company. The records of the French courts and the French laws before the Senate and the testimony before the committee of Senator Pasco, a member of the Commission charged with the special duty of investigating this subject, establish the sufficiency of that title. I have nothing to add to the statement of the views of the minority of the subcommittee on legal questions, which I signed. I propose now to point out only certain other matters of the highest importance which have been overlooked or misapprehended.

In all the discussion of the question of the route to be chosen for an isthmian canal, both in Congress and outside of it, there has been, on the part of the advocates of the Nicaragua route, an extraordinary assumption that if that route should be selected the necessary concessions from Costa Rica and Nicaragua were assured, the work of construction could be begun without delay and no legal questions or complications would be met. It has also been assumed that the Commission's estimate of the cost of the Nicaragua Canal covered every item of expense, as it does in the case of the Panama Canal, and that the difference of about $5,000,000, shown by the Commission between the cost of the two canals, represented the total additional expense which we should incur if we adopted the Nicaragua route.

The Senator from Washington, starting with this assumption, even attempted to go further and to show that it was the estimates for Panama which did not cover all items of expense.

These assumptions are clearly erroneous. They must be corrected and the true situation must be understood before we can be in a position to appreciate properly the relative advantages of the two routes, with respect to concessions, legal difficulties, cost, and the time within which a canal by either route may be begun and may be completed. In fact, as the documents before the Senate show, in respect of all these matters the situation is far clearer, simpler, and plainer as to the Panama route than as to the Nicaragua route, and a canal by the latter route will cost not merely five, but an indefinite number of millions more than at Panama.

At Panama the whole route lies within the territories of one State—the Republic of Colombia. A form of treaty has been submitted by the Government of Colombia, not as a finality, but as a basis for negotiation, and we have no reason to doubt that, with the readiness which that Government has shown, a satisfactory treaty can be finally made. This will settle, by one instrument, everything concerning concessions and control, and there is no reason to expect any delay in reaching a result.

There has been criticism of the terms of the treaty proposed by Colombia which must receive consideration in any final negotiations. But two things must be borne in mind. One is that any treaty before it becomes a finality must be submitted to the approval of the Senate, and therefore neither this body nor the United States can be considered committed to any terms of a mere proposal which has not been so submitted. The other is that this proposal of Colombia was made without her being able to obtain any information from any authorized officer or agent of this Government of its desires or expectations.

In a letter to the Secretary of State by the counsel of the New Panama Canal Company of March 31, 1902, prepared at the request of the Colombian minister and submitted with the treaty, he says, for the minister:

> But Colombia is in the dark as to the precise desires and needs of the United States upon the subject, and Minister Concha can not, of course, anticipate in his first statement all the reasonable requirements of this Government. He wishes, however, to manifest in the most hearty manner the desire of his Government to facilitate the purposes of the United States, and this disposition is manifested by the comprehensive convention which he has this day submitted to you, but not as an ultimatum.

And in his own letter of the same date the minister says, upon the question of the sum to be paid, which was so much a subject of concern to the Senator from Washington:

> Colombia has no lust of unjust gain through the construction of a canal in her territory, and a final convention on this subject will not be hampered by pecuniary considerations. (Senate Doc., May 16, 1902.)

The Secretary of State has taken the position always that, in advance of authority from Congress, he could not even negotiate upon the subject; he could only receive and transmit to Congress whatever proposals or suggestions Colombia chose to make. The submission of this form of convention under such circumstances is a proof of Colombia's good will, and the accompanying communications show the liberal spirit in which she is prepared to take up the subject whenever any officer of this Government is authorized to negotiate. More she could not do, and it is impossible from her action to infer anything but the most reasonable desire to satisfy our just requirements. And if we make a treaty with Colombia we have no other power to consider and no other agreement to obtain.

Upon the Nicaragua route the situation is very different. There we must deal with two countries—Nicaragua and Costa Rica. It has been recognized that our control must extend over a belt at least 3 miles in width on each side of the axis of the canal. For a long distance in the eastern part of the route the projected canal lies either in the San Juan River, which there forms the boundary between Nicaragua and Costa Rica, or so near it that the 3-mile strip to the south of the canal will lie wholly, or almost wholly, in Costa Rican territory. The very foundations of the Conchuda Dam, the key to the whole eastern division of the canal, must be laid half in Costa Rican soil, and the construction of that dam will flood great areas of Costa Rican territory.

Of the 54 sluice gates required in connection with the dam, 32 are to be in Costa Rica, and the Commission says:

> A portion of the dam across the river and the swamp on the Costa Rica side, for a total distance of 731 feet, will consist, below low water, of caissons placed close together, with the joints between them sealed. * * * Core walls extend 100 feet farther on the Costa Rica side and 240 feet on the Nicaragua side. (Rept., November 16, 1901, p. 158.)

It has been necessarily recognized by everybody that a treaty with Costa Rica is as essential as one with Nicaragua, and that without treaties with both these countries the construction of the canal can not be even begun.

Nicaragua, like Colombia, has submitted a proposed form of treaty. It is not as complete as that submitted by Colombia, and contains unsatisfactory provisions, to which I shall refer hereafter—provisions which, if they are not changed, open up a prospect of almost limitless expense to this Government. But we should, no doubt, consider this proposed Nicaraguan treaty as only tentative, like that proposed by Colombia, and should expect that reasonable modifications of the terms proposed may be obtained, as well as satisfactory provisions upon points not covered.

With Costa Rica the case is very different. Not only has she proposed no terms but she has expressly stated her total inability to enter into any treaty without an amendment to her constitution. By an official communication to this Government (Sen. Doc., May 16, 1902) Costa Rica says:

> In consequence thereof the Government is powerless to enter into positive negotiations with that of the United States of America unless there shall be previously passed a constitutional amendment by which such concessions for the construction of the interoceanic canal may be authorized or the matter referred to public opinion in some other way by calling a constituent assembly for the purpose.

Whether a constituent assembly would ever be called by the Government of Costa Rica for this purpose we do not know. They do not offer nor apparently intend to call one, at any rate, at present. What action such an assembly would take can be only matter of conjecture. The Government of Costa Rica, unlike those of Nicaragua and Colombia, makes no proposals and holds out no hopes. They say simply that they can make no treaty and enter into no negotiations now.

Thus the route of the Nicaragua Canal is blocked by an impossible barrier—a barrier which may be removed, indeed, but which is none the less a positive bar while it remains, and of the removal of which there is no present prospect. Even were the Government of Costa Rica ready at once to take steps to remove this obstacle it is obvious that a long time must elapse before the constitution of that country could be amended, even supposing that the people are willing to amend it, and this amendment would be but the prelude to negotiations between Costa Rica and this country, which would, in any case, be necessary before a treaty could be made.

As matters stand, no treaty can be made, no negotiations can be begun, even, and we must wait until the constitution of Costa Rica has been amended before we can so much as learn the disposition of that country toward the plan.

None of the Senators who have spoken in favor of the Hepburn bill has referred to this statement of the inability of Costa Rica to enter into negotiations. The Senator from Alabama based his contention that the way was clear in respect of treaties for the Nicaragua Canal upon two protocols signed in December, 1900—a year and a half ago—by the ministers of Nicaragua and Costa Rica, respectively, and the Secretary of State of the United States. Apparently he overlooked the fact that Nicaragua had formulated, to some extent, by her expectations, and that Costa Rica had declared her inability to comply with her protocol. It is therefore the more necessary to direct the attention of the Senate to this situation.

The Costa Rican protocol of 1900 is as little to the purpose now as any other obsolete agreement. Nothing has ever been done under it, and the Government of Costa Rica has declared that it is constitutionally unable to carry it out. We can not undertake to compel that Government to violate the constitution of the country; we can not interfere in its domestic affairs and force it to amend its constitution or call a constituent assembly; we can not seize upon its territory by force and occupy it in spite of its laws.

Nor is the protocol of 1900 of any value. Taken at its utmost it only requires Costa Rica to "enter into negotiations." Suppose that Costa Rica did this, and thus complied strictly with the protocol. We should finally reach the same point of constitutional inability, and the negotiations would be without result. What should we do then? It can not be supposed that we should use force—should go to war, yet we must either do that or abandon the canal, or await the good pleasure of Costa Rica in dealing with us.

Nor can we complain if the Government of Costa Rica abides by the rules of her constitution. Even if they were willing to do otherwise, what virtue would there be in any treaty in the execution of which the officers of that Government exceeded their constitutional powers? It would be no treaty, and from it we neither ought to acquire nor could acquire any rights.

But we need not consider that question, for no such treaty will be made. Costa Rica will not even negotiate. Therefore the fact is that we can not obtain the concessions requisite for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, and so far from that route being open to us, it is absolutely closed. At Panama, on the other hand, the way is open for negotiation with every prospect of a satisfactory result.

The utmost effect of the protocols of December, 1900, concerning the Nicaragua route, were they still in force and of binding validity, would be that the two countries whose consent is necessary to the use of that route would negotiate concerning the rights which we require. That condition exists now respecting the Panama route, where Colombia is ready to negotiate. It does not exist respecting the Nicaragua route, where one of the countries without whose consent we can not proceed is absolutely unable even to discuss the question of permitting us to do so.

If the Senators from Kansas and Washington had been aware of this situation they surely would not have advocated the passage of the Hepburn bill. Both Senators dwelt much upon the desirability of avoiding delay, and the Senator from Kansas, in answer to a question of the senior Senator from South Carolina, said that he understood that ample concessions could be had from Costa Rica. The Senator had been misinformed. Had he known the fact that no concessions of any kind can be had from Costa Rica, it must have modified his views. Both Senators expressed an ardent wish for an isthmian canal in the shortest possible time. With that wish I sympathize. It is my own. But it can not be gratified by selecting a route where no canal can now be built and excluding the only route where a canal can be built at once.

It is the plain fact which we must look in the face, of which we are warned and of which all the country will, sooner or later, become aware, if it is not aware now, that to pass the Hepburn bill can have absolutely no other effect than to delay indefinitely the construction of an isthmian canal. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that to pass that bill will be a perfectly futile proceeding; it will direct the President to do what we know that he can not do, and will mean simply that there shall be no canal. This is not matter of argument or inference, but of plain, indisputable fact, officially known, and for that reason, if for no other, I am against that bill.

The assumption of the supporters of the Nicaragua route is, therefore, as I have said, the exact opposite of the real fact. The Panama route, where they have assumed that difficulties exist with regard to a treaty, presents no such difficulties; the Nicaragua route, where they have assumed that no such difficulties exist, is absolutely closed to us by an obstacle which is, for the present at least, insuperable.

Equally the reverse of the fact is the assumption that legal questions and complications exist at Panama to any unusual or extraordinary extent, and that no such questions exist at Nicaragua.

At Panama there are no concessions whatever except those of the New Panama Canal Company and the Panama Railroad Company, which we shall acquire if we adopt that route. All the property which we are to purchase there belongs to the New Panama Canal Company, and came to it by purchase under authority of court from the receiver of a dissolved corporation, in a way which is clear and simple and presents no difficulties. The receiver has been authorized by the court to join in the conveyance for further assurance. Of course the law officers of the Government will examine the title to this property critically, as they would do in the case of any other purchase by the United States. But the title is all of record; it comes through court proceedings, the validity of which is easily determined and can be speedily and with certainty passed upon.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator does not mean to be understood in the statement he makes that the New Panama Canal Company is the owner of all the property on the Isthmus of Panama which it undertakes to sell to us? He does not mean to be understood as including in that statement the Panama Railroad?

Mr. KITTREDGE. I certainly do; that is, all the stock of the Panama Railway Company but a very small minority of the stock.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is it not a fact, though, that the New Panama Canal Company is not the owner of the railroad, but is simply the owner of a majority of the stock in the railroad?

Mr. KITTREDGE. That states the case precisely. The New Panama Canal Company owns, in round numbers, 69,000 out of the 70,000 shares of stock of the Panama Railroad Company.

Mr. MITCHELL. But the Panama Railroad Company was organized under a charter of the State of New York, and it is to-day managed and controlled by a board of directors having their office in New York, and residing there. The company has not been changed. The road is owned by the company, and, as the Senator states, all the interest the new Panama Canal Company has is simply a control of the stock.

Mr. KITTREDGE. The fact is——

Mr. MITCHELL. So if we purchase this property we undertake to purchase 69,000 shares of the stock of the Panama Railroad Company. I desire to suggest to the distinguished Senator now speaking whether, in his judgment, the United States can take and own stock in a railroad company.

Mr. KITTREDGE. If the United States can construct a canal, it can do all that is necessary to accomplish that purpose, including the purchase of stock in the Panama Railway Company, which is necessary in order to successfully build and construct and operate the canal.

Mr. MITCHELL. I suggest to the Senator that the question as to whether the Government of the United States can take and hold and own stock in a private corporation is one that is entirely separate and distinct from the question as to whether the Government can build a canal.

Mr. KITTREDGE. If the Senator from Oregon has any trouble on that score, there is a very easy method pointed out by the statutes of the State of New York by which all the difficulties he suggests may be remedied. The statutes of the State of New York, cited in the views of the minority, point out a very easy and speedy way by which that corporation can be dissolved, and in that way, if in no other, can title to the Panama Railway Company be secured.

Mr. MITCHELL. I simply desired to have the facts before the Senate.

Mr. KITTREDGE. No real defects have been suggested; everything appears regular and in accordance with the practice of courts everywhere, and at any rate no long time can be required for the law department of the Government to satisfy itself upon all points. When this has once been done, all legal questions are disposed of. The title of the New Panama Canal Company is the only matter to be considered, and its examination will be speedy and simple. Since, moreover, the New Panama Canal Company already owns nearly all the lands which will be required in any way in the construction of the canal, there is no prospect of any subsequent legal questions of any importance.

At Nicaragua, on the other hand, the legal questions are intricate, numerous, and troublesome.

In the first place, absolutely none of the land needed will become ours at once. In the proposed treaty with Nicaragua this Government is to be given free right of way through public lands and to be allowed, at its own expense and upon paying for them, to condemn the lands of individuals and corporations which it may need. While much of the canal line east of the lake lies through a wilderness, yet it is obvious that in the more than 110 miles of the route, exclusive of the lake, many parcels of property of individuals must be taken. Nor can we even guess how much of the unimproved land may be claimed or held by others than the Government of Nicaragua. Plainly an indefinite amount of litigation and number of legal questions will arise here.

As to lands in Costa Rica, since the country declares itself unable even to negotiate for a treaty, nothing can be said, except that this fact makes it impossible for the United States to procure the necessary lands in that country in any manner, at any time, at any cost.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. KITTREDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. Do I understand the Senator to contend that it is utterly impossible to get a good title to a strip of land through Costa Rica on which to locate this canal, and that Costa Rica will have to amend her constitution in order to enable us to get a good title? Is that correct?

Mr. KITTREDGE. My contention is that Costa Rica is constitutionally unable at the present time to make any treaty or to enter into any negotiation; and that is clearly stated in her official communication to this Government of recent date. My argument, based upon that official fact, is that, for the present at least, so far as the Nicaragua route is concerned, we are unable to proceed.

Mr. CLAY. Is it not true that the minority of the committee recommend that in the event we can not get a good title to the Panama route, after an investigation by the law Department of the Government, we proceed at once to construct a canal on the Nicaragua route? The bill of the minority that the Senator is supporting provides, as I understand it, that if we can not get a good title to the Panama route, we shall proceed at once to construct a canal on the Nicaragua line.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Always assuming, of course, that we can secure the necessary foundation—the right to construct a canal through Costa Rican and Nicaraguan territory.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator will allow me, is it not a fact that the Nicaraguan Government has given assurance to the Secretary of State that the difficulties to which the Senator refers will be put out of the way in a very short time?

Mr. KITTREDGE. There has been, so far as I know, no official declaration to that effect. It is stated that there is private correspondence to the effect that they are willing to negotiate after we have selected a route. That is as far as they have gone, and as far as I know anyone who advocates the Nicaraguan route has ever claimed that Costa Rica has gone.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is as far as any of them have gone.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Officially Costa Rica says she is constitutionally unable to proceed even to negotiate a treaty which will give us the right to pass through her territory in the construction of a canal or otherwise.

Mr. CLAY. How long will it take Costa Rica to amend her constitution?

Mr. KITTREDGE. That is a matter purely of conjecture, and one of the things which I think ought to cause the advocates of the Nicaraguan route to pause and give it serious consideration.

But the legal questions connected with the acquisition of the necessary lands for the canal, important and complicated as they are, are of less importance than those arising from the concessions already existing or asserted to be existing, which, if maintained, would still further impede and complicate, if not prevent, the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, at any rate until some means has been found of removing them.

Three concessions have been granted which would affect the construction of the canal:

First. The Pellas concession.

Second. The Atlas concession.

Third. The Maritime Canal Company's concession.

The Pellas concession was granted by Nicaragua on March 26, 1877. It gave an exclusive privilege for the navigation of the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua by steam. It was transferred, through various holders, to the Atlas Steamship Company, an English corporation, and is now owned by the Carribean and Pacific Transit Company, a subsidiary corporation of the Atlas Company. There can be no question that the construction of the Nicaragua Canal would involve a violation of this concession. It expires, it is true, in November, 1904, but this would involve a delay such as the advocates of the Nicaragua Canal so much deprecate, and which we must all desire to avoid, of more than two years.

The Atlas Company holds a concession from Nicaragua for the exclusive navigation of the Silico Lagoon and the exclusive right to build railways and tramways along the lower San Juan for thirty years from September 30, 1897—that is, until September 30, 1927. This contract was not to be an obstacle to contracts which Nicaragua might make relative to the opening of an interoceanic canal. Whether this phrase means that no such contracts, though impairing the concession, shall give a right to compensation, or whether it means that the holders of the concession can not prevent the making and carrying out of such contracts, but may claim compensation for injury sustained by them, are questions of importance and of no easy solution. Yet they must be settled before we can know where we stand or what we must pay in respect of any concessions granted us by Nicaragua.

But far more important and serious than the Pellas or Atlas concessions are those of the Maritime Canal Company.

The Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua was chartered by act of Congress of February 20, 1889. It acquired from the Nicaragua Canal Construction Company exclusive concessions from Nicaragua and Costa Rica, to run for ninety-nine years from the opening of the canal to commerce, for the construction through the territories of the two Governments of a ship canal connecting the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. This concession had been originally obtained by A. G. Menocal, an engineer formerly in the service of this Government, and had been by him transferred to the construction company.

Out of more than $22,000,000 of stock issued by the company only about $1,000,000 was issued for cash. About $3,200,000 was issued for work done, as were also bonds to the amount of $1,855,000. These facts appear by the report of the company to the Secretary of the Interior of November 30, 1901.

The company proposed to construct a canal according to plans of Mr. Menocal, but these plans, made without sufficient investigation, were radically defective and impossible of execution. They comprised a dam at Ochoa which three separate commissions—the Ludlow board of 1895, the Nicaragua Commission of 1897, and the Isthmian Canal Commission of 1899—have pronounced impossible; and a basin where walls were to be be formed in part of a supposed range of hills which does not exist, and in part of embankments greater than any ever built for such a purpose at places where the Isthmian Commission found the soil so soft that a gas pipe sank of its own weight for 80 feet. These things illustrate the manner in which the company set about its work.

Work was begun, however; dredges were brought from Colon, part of the line was cleared, some service railway built, and a short stretch of canal partially excavated in the swamp near Greytown. In 1893 the construction company failed and was wound up; construction wholly ceased and has never been resumed, and whatever either company had of property in Nicaragua was substantially abandoned.

In 1895 this Government appointed a board of engineers, under the presidency of Colonel Ludlow, to examine the situation. Lack of time and money prevented a thorough investigation, but the board disapproved the Menocal plan and recommended a different route and fuller investigation.

In 1897 the Government appointed the Nicaragua Canal Commission, under Admiral Walker. This Commission surveyed the route, confirmed the views of the Ludlow board, and recommended substantially the route adopted by the Isthmian Canal Commission, whose reports are before us.

In 1899, the company having abandoned its work for six years, the Government of Nicaragua announced that its concession would become forfeited for failure to complete the canal within the time required. Against this the company protested and requested arbitration under the terms of the concession. Nicaragua consented and named two arbitrators, but a dispute arising as to the arbitrators named by the company, the arbitration never proceeded. On August 10, 1900, Nicaragua proceeded, under the claim of forfeiture of the concession, to take possession of the property of the company in Nicarauga which would belong to it in case of forfeiture, and has since retained this property or disposed of it at its pleasure. Against this action the company protested to the Secretary of State of the United States, on October 23, 1900. This protest it renewed in its reports to the Secretary of the Interior for 1900 and 1901. The Secretary of State, in a letter to the Minister of the United States to Central America, on December 28, 1899, had expressed the opinion that the position of the company on the question of the selection of arbitrators was justified, but no action appears to have been taken on the company's protests of October, 1900, nor does the company appear to have pressed its claims further than by filing its protest.

If, then, the action of Nicaragua in declaring the Maritime Canal Company's concession forfeited was invalid, we, if we took a concession from that Government and constructed a canal on that route. should be acting in direct violation of exclusive rights owned by a corporation chartered by Congress. Whether the concession was really forfeited is plainly a difficult legal question. This question must be met and answered before our title can be clear, and the complication which it causes is serious.

It is true that by Article X of the treaty which it has proposed Nicaragua covenants and guarantees to the United States that there is no outstanding concession "which in any manner encumbers or conflicts with the lease and the rights and privileges hereby granted," but we have the very terms of these concessions before us in the appendix to the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission. They are not equivocal, except, perhaps, as to the effect of the provision of the Atlas concession that it shall not be "an obstacle" to contracts for an interoceanic canal. We may judge them for ourselves, and we shall be only preparing the way for future complications if we proceed relying upon a covenant of Nicaragua which we know beforehand not to be in accordance with the fact.

The Maritime Canal Company had also a concession from Costa Rica which has never been declared forfeited. If that country could or would grant us a concession otherwise, how can it do so, or how could we accept the concession, with this other earlier and exclusive concession, owned by a corporation of the United States, outstanding?

I am aware that before the committee the secretary of the Maritime Canal Company and the president of the Nicaragua Company—a successor of the Nicaragua Canal Construction Company, but which never has done anything and does not apparently intend ever to do anything in the way of construction—urged the adoption of the Nicaragua route, while still claiming that the Maritime Canal Company's concessions are valid. But both of them stated that they expected compensation to the amount of millions from this Government, if it did so, and while the secretary of the Maritime Canal Company expressed a willingness to leave the amount of their compensation to the good feeling of Congress, he expressly disclaimed all authority to speak for the company or for anyone but himself.

Nor is this all. Article XI of the proposed treaty submitted by the minister from Nicaragua is as follows:

> Although maintaining that upon principles of justice no valid claims of citizens of the United States exist against Nicaragua, the latter accepts the engagement of the United States to pay and to discharge Nicaragua from all liability on account of claims of citizens of the United States which may have arisen prior to the date of the signing of this convention.

The meaning of this provision in the light of the existing circumstances is not doubtful. The United States is to guarantee the correctness of Nicaragua's proceedings respecting the Maritime Canal Company. If those proceedings were unjust, if Nicaragua has oppressed our citizens, we are to pay for it. Should the views of our Secretary of State and of the Maritime Canal Company prove to be correct, the United States must bear the burden of the wrongful acts of Nicaragua and must respond in damages because a foreign country, against our protest, has wrongfully deprived an American company of its concessions and its property.

No doubt the Maritime Canal Company will find the United States a better debtor than Nicaragua. No doubt it will be convenient for it to have the advantage of the opinion of the Secretary of State in its favor in pressing its claims against this Government. But while it may be natural that Nicaragua, in granting a new concession, should require protection against claims arising out of the old one, it can not be possible for this Government to assume such a position as that in which this article of the proposed treaty would place it. I do not forget that modifications of the proposed treaty may be possible. I desire only to point out the purpose of the existing provision as it is framed—a purpose which might be obscure were not the circumstances known—and to note how it has been framed at once to shift the responsibility for Nicaragua's action from that country to the United States and to improve the prospects for the Maritime Canal Company's obtaining substantial sums from this Government.

Mr. SPOONER. Is the Senator able to advise me whether that treaty was negotiated in Nicaragua or negotiated here?

Mr. KITTREDGE. It was negotiated in this country.

Mr. SPOONER. By whom?

Mr. KITTREDGE. I am unable to state.

Mr. SPOONER. By the State Department?

Mr. KITTREDGE. I think by the State Department; but by just whom I am unable to say.

And this liability, it must be observed, is exclusive of and in addition to any liability which we may incur by our own action if we infringe exclusive concessions which are finally held to be still valid.

Thus it is plain, I believe, that the second of the assumptions of the advocates of the Nicaragua route is also the opposite of the fact, and that while the legal questions at Panama are few and simple those at Nicaragua are numerous, complicated, and serious. They open up a prospect of almost interminable dispute and litigation, and even if we could obtain the requisite concessions for that route they must cause delay which can not now be estimated, unless we should be prepared to proceed, leaving them unsettled, and so to plunge into the labyrinth without knowing how nor when nor where we shall emerge.

I come now to the third of the assumptions of the Nicaragua advocates—that concerning the cost of the two canals. I do not propose to criticise or analyze the details of the estimates. These have been made by the distinguished experts of the Isthmian Canal Commission and I do not question their correctness. At any rate I shall not set myself up as a superior authority upon such points.

The Senator from Washington said that "every commission ever appointed in this country, every man of scientific attainments who has ever studied this question, has declared" that a canal by the Nicaragua route "can be constructed as cheaply, to say the least, as by any other route." I do not know upon what the Senator based this statement. No commission appointed in this country ever examined the question of comparative cost of routes, except the Isthmian Canal Commission, and that Commission certainly reported that, even omitting from consideration vast items of expense for the Nicaragua route which do not exist for the Panama route, the Nicaragua Canal would cost $5,000,000 more than the Panama Canal. I have not learned of any commission which has expressed such an opinion as the Senator mentioned. Neither do I know who the men of scientific attainments can be to whom he referred. Certainly none appeared before the committee to say that the Nicaragua Canal could be built as cheaply as the Panama Canal, nor have I heard any such opinions quoted from any man who can be called "of scientific attainments."

Certainly the Senator from Kansas holds no such opinion, though he stands with the Senator from Washington in advocating the Nicaragua Canal. On the examination of Admiral Walker before the committee the Senator from Kansas took occasion expressly to disclaim any such opinion, and said to the witness, "I hope, Admiral, you did not understand my questions yesterday as indicating that the total cost of the Nicaragua line was less than the cost of Panama." (S. Doc. 253, pt. 2, p. 504.) We have had the contrary opinion expressed also by the members of the Isthmian Canal Commission, whose scientific attainments are well known, and I can not but think that the Senator has been misinformed upon the subject.

Nor can I accept the changes which the Senator undertook to make in the estimates of the Commission for the purpose of showing that the Nicaragua Canal would be less costly to build than the Panama Canal. In order to reach this result he added to the Commission's estimates items and amounts for which I have not been able to find justification in the evidence before the Senate.

In the first place he added $2,356,700 for the Alhajuela dam. But the Commission does not propose to build a dam at Alhajuela. This the Senator admits, but he deduces from the report that the Commission considered a dam there as a possibility at some time, and therefore he treats it as part of the cost of original construction. It seems to me that the Commission may be trusted to understand their own plans and that we have no right to add to their figures the cost of a structure which they do not intend to erect, and consider unnecessary.

Next the Senator added $1,000,000 for a temporary dam at Bohio. This he did upon testimony of Admiral Walker, who expressly disclaimed any knowledge upon the subject, but who was not sure that the estimates provided for this. Had the Senator carried his investigation into the testimony of Mr. Noble, one of the Commission, he would have found the following with reference to the Bohio dam:

Senator HAWLEY. What is the estimate of the cost of it?
Senator HARRIS. $8,000,000, I believe.
Mr. NOBLE. $6,400,000 for the Bohio dam?
Senator HARRIS. I was going to ask you with regard to the cost of a temporary dam which, as perhaps you know, has been stated here, was not included in that estimate.
Mr. NOBLE. I find that an allowance of half a million dollars was made for a temporary dam in the estimates. (Senate Doc. 253, part 2, p. 711.)

Colonel Ernst also testified to the inclusion of the cost of the temporary dam in the estimates, and upon his examination the following occurred regarding the amount:

Colonel ERNST. We estimated it at $500,000.
The CHAIRMAN. Do you think that is enough?
Colonel ERNST. I think so. (Senate Doc. 253, part 2, p. 677.)

The very basis upon which the Senator from Washington placed this item of $1,000,000 is gone and that item also is erroneous.

The Senator further undertook to add to the Commission's estimate for the Panama Canal the sum of $3,486,918 for the bonded indebtedness of the Panama Railroad Company. But the testimony of Admiral Walker and Mr. Morison of the Commission is to the effect that the railroad will earn during the period of construction, from purely commercial business, enough to more than pay off all this debt.

Admiral Walker's testimony is as follows:

Senator HARRIS. We would be buying a great deal which would not be essential to the canal, as far as that is concerned.
Admiral WALKER. I don't know about that, Senator. I think that all that property would be used and used to great advantage.
Senator HARRIS. Well, in addition to the valuation which you put upon that property of $7,000,000, there are financial liabilities in other directions which are liable to run up the price materially.
Admiral WALKER. No; the financial liabilities are not great, and would soon be paid off in the natural course of events. With that railroad, you know, goes also the Panama Steamship Line, with all of its property. It belongs to the railroad and is a part of the railroad property.
Senator HANNA. Is it not true that during the time of the construction of the canal it would be fair to suppose that the net earnings of the railroad property would pay off all of these outstanding obligations, which were paid in the shape of construction, and more, too?
Admiral WALKER. Oh, yes; much more.
Senator HARRIS. Those net earnings are simply charged to the construction of the canal. It is taking money from one pocket and putting it in another.
Senator HANNA. Oh, no; excuse me.
Senator HARRIS. You mean in the transportation of freight for outside parties not relating to the canal?
Senator HANNA. Yes; because that is largely, almost entirely, the business of the last few years, when the canal has simply been under construction with a very moderate force; the net earnings of the railroad company from its legitimate business for which it was built show a very large earning capacity, which would pay off all these bonds and leave a large surplus to the credit of the purchase money.
Senator HARRIS. My idea would be, and I would like to have the admiral's opinion as to that, that when the full force is put at work and the railroad is here and there diverted and is occupied with the enormous work of construction, that there would be comparatively little opportunity for the operation of the road as a freight road for outside parties.
Admiral WALKER. Oh, it would undoubtedly be run as a commercial road, just as it is now. There is no reason why it should not be. That is, the through line between Panama and Colon would be run as a commercial road.
Senator HARRIS. That would necessarily require the construction of an amount of additional track, which would be used for the other purpose.
Admiral WALKER. Not much additional track, as it is very largely in place now. The track would have to be shifted from time to time, of course, as the work progressed. The tracks for canal work would not interfere with the main line of road.
Senator HARRIS. Then it would require constant change?
Admiral WALKER. Yes; the tracks for canal work; but that would be the case under any circumstances during construction of the canal.
Senator HARRIS. And that would interfere more or less with its operation as a commercial road.
Admiral WALKER. They are using it for both purposes, and have been all the time. The canal work does not interfere with its work as a commercial road in any way. With a stronger force at work it would simply be run more after the manner of a large road. There would be more trains on it. There are now two passenger trains a day each way.
Senator HARRIS. In this estimate, of course, the railroad does not cover any of the trackage or property which is used in the cuts and on the Panama Canal itself?
Admiral WALKER. The track in the cuts and that kind of thing belongs to the canal people.
Senator HARRIS. Separate from the other?
Admiral WALKER. Yes.
Senator HARRIS. How about the motive power?
Admiral WALKER. They have their own locomotives and their own cars.
Senator HARRIS. They do not use the locomotives of the railroad for any such purpose?
Admiral WALKER. No, sir; they have their own. They have a large number of locomotives down there. (S. Doc. 253, pt. 2, pp. 444, 445.)

Mr. Morison's testimony is as follows:

Senator HARRIS. That being the case, do you think it is reasonable for us to pay $140,000 a mile for the Panama road?
Mr. MORISON. Yes, sir; all things considered, I do. The Panama Railroad holds something more than itself. It has something more than a railroad. The company have a good deal of other property, and they will earn a great deal of money from commercial business during the construction of the canal, whichever canal is built. They will not earn anything after the canal is completed.
Senator HARRIS. Do you think that the amount they would earn in the construction of the canal and the doing of this work would more than pay off the indebtedness which now hangs over them?
Mr. MORISON. Yes; I do.
Senator HARRIS. There is a considerable indebtedness aside from the stock which hangs over that road?

Mr. MORISON. I think the indebtedness is stated in detail in the supplemental report of the Commission. I think it is correct. (S. Doc. 253, pt. 2, p. 571.)

These estimates are confirmed by the statement of the net earnings of the railroad given by Mr. Drake, the vice-president of the company (S. Doc. 253, pt. 1, p. 257), nor have they been contradicted or questioned. Under these circumstances the Commission could not properly have treated a bonded debt which the earnings of the property will pay before the canal can be finished as an additional item of cost. It is not that, and I can not suppose that the Senator from Washington would have so treated it had his attention been called to the evidence which I have quoted.

The Senator suggested also that $1,000,000 should be added for the price of 50,000 shares of the stock of the New Panama Canal Company, which he supposed we should be bound to pay to the Republic of Colombia, under the form of treaty proposed by that country. But, waiving the point that this whole proposed treaty is subject to amendment, nothing in it justifies such a view. The provision in question is found in Article I, by which Colombia grants to the New Panama Canal Company leave to sell to the United States. That article is as follows:

The Government of Colombia authorizes the New Panama Canal Company to sell and transfer to the United States its rights, privileges, properties, and concessions, as well as the Panama Railroad and all the shares or part of the shares of that company, with the exception of the public lands situated outside of the zone hereinafter specified, now corresponding to the concessions to both said enterprises, which public lands shall revert to the Republic of Colombia.

But it is understood that Colombia reserves all its rights to the special shares in the capital of the New Panama Canal Company, to which reference is made in Article IV of the contract of December 10, 1890, which shares shall be paid their full nominal value at least.

The railroad company (and the United States as owner of the enterprise) shall be free from the obligations imposed by the railroad concession, excepting as to the payment at maturity by the railroad company of the outstanding bonds issued by said railroad company.

It is obvious that this imports no obligation on the part of the United States, but is merely a saving clause for the purpose of preserving Colombia's rights as a shareholder in the company and to avoid any implication that by consenting to a sale it relinquished those rights also. The company may sell, but Colombia retains her shares and requires them to be redeemed by the company out of the purchase price or otherwise. The United States has nothing to do with this and nothing to pay. This item, too, of the Senator's additions to the cost of the Panama Canal is unsupported by the facts before us.

There remains, out of the grand total of $8,283,418 which the Senator thought should be added to the cost of the Panama Canal, only the sum of $439,800, which he assigned as the purchase price of the 1,466 shares of Panama Railroad stock held by others than the New Panama Canal Company. The basis upon which he has made up this amount is confessedly conjectural. I shall not undertake to put conjecture against conjecture, though I can not agree with the Senator's estimates. I am not sure that we shall ever have to pay anything for those shares, nor what we will have to pay, if we do pay anything. But, allowing his estimate on this head to stand, the result would be that, instead of the Nicaragua Canal costing $5,630,704 more than the Panama, it would cost $5,190,904 more. He would have brought the difference in favor of Panama down to nearer $5,000,000, and for that difference in so large a sum it is hardly worth while to dispute.

But I think that I have shown beyond contradiction that none of the other sums by which he proposed to swell the cost of the Panama Canal can be justified, and that the Isthmian Canal Commission committed no error in not including them. His thesis that the Nicaragua Canal is the cheaper is disproved. But I desire to point out that the Commission did not profess to include certain items of cost in their estimate for either route, and to show how this fact affects the final totals given for the cost of either canal. The question is one intimately connected with these other questions of treaty and law which I have been discussing, and it is for this reason that I refer to it here.

At Panama, as I have said, there are no concessions but those which we shall acquire if we adopt that route. Substantially all lands required in any way in connection with the canal are already owned by the New Panama Canal Company and will be included in the sale to us. Therefore if, as the Commission has done, we add to the purchase price of $40,000,000 the sum of $142,000,000 required to complete the work, we shall have the true total of the cost of that canal.

But at Nicaragua this is not so. The Commission confined itself in both cases very properly to estimates for the cost of construction and materials—the matters with which they were familiar as experts. They assumed that we had the land and a clear concession, and told us what it would cost to build the canal under those circumstances. They did not undertake to say anything of the cost of clearing away conflicting concessions or of obtaining the land on which to locate the canal. These things, no doubt, they considered not within their province. They are, however, within our province. We must consider them and we can not reach a rational decision without doing so.

At Panama we shall have the lands needed; at Nicaragua we must buy them.

The Senator from Washington assumed that the lands needed must be bought upon both routes; but if he had examined the supplementary report of the Isthmian Canal Commission he would have found that the New Panama Canal Company already owns substantially all the lands required, which would pass to the United States under the proposed sale (p. 4). Had he further examined the records of the Isthmian Canal Commission he would have found them in possession of elaborate maps, showing in detail the lands along the canal line owned by the canal company, the railroad company, the Government, and private owners, from which also this appears. Therefore, the situation is not the same with respect to lands at Nicaragua and at Panama, and so much of his argument as depends upon this assumption falls to the ground.

At Nicaragua, as I have said, we must buy what land we need, which is not unappropriated public land, and must pay for it. Does anybody know what we must pay for it? We know that the entire canal route between the lake and Brito is claimed by the Maritime Canal Company by title which would not be affected even if the forfeiture of their concession was valid. Their secretary testified before the committee that they bought and paid for it. Along other parts of the route private lands must be taken for the canal or works connected with it or be flooded among the immense areas which will be submerged by the back water from the dams to be erected. The treaty proposed by Nicaragua gives us the right to occupy the public lands without payment, but by Articles III and V of that treaty we must pay for all lands of private persons or corporations. We have not the least means of forming any idea of what this will mean to us in cost, except that we know that we must pay for all the land we need west of the lake. How much we must pay for and how much we shall get without payment east of the lake we can not even guess. No lands have been withdrawn from entry, so far as we know, and there will be apt to be very little government land on the canal line when we proceed to construct it, should we do so.

The Senator from Alabama has taken the position that Nicaragua could make no grants or sales of land to private persons after entering into the protocol of December 1, 1900, but I am wholly at a loss to know upon what that position is based. The protocol, which is, after all, but a mere memorandum between ministers and has never received any confirmation from either country, does not profess even to bind Nicaragua to anything but to negotiate when the United States is ready to do so. There is not a word in it of anything else. It does not even require Nicaragua to give us free use of the lands which shall not have been appropriated by private persons when final arrangements are made.

How it can be so construed as to bind her not to sell or grant lands on the canal route in advance of definite negotiations I can not understand. The proposed Nicaraguan treaty requires the United States to pay for all lands owned by private parties "at the date of this convention" (Article V), and this is conclusive evidence that that country intends to continue to grant lands until the treaty is actually signed. Whatever lands are held by private persons along the line, whether granted before or since December, 1900, we must buy. How many millions all this will cost us we can not estimate. We can know and we do know that it will add millions to the estimated cost of the Nicaragua Canal, but of the amount to which this additional expense may run we can have no idea.

In addition to all this are the sums which we must pay to clear away existing concessions. Shall we wait two years for the Pellas concession to expire? If not, we must open our pockets again to dispose of that. Are the holders of the Atlas concession to have damages? That is one of the legal questions to be settled, but it is hardly reasonable to suppose that their business can be destroyed and their property rendered valueless without compensation. What this will mean in money can not be estimated now. Finally comes the claim of the Maritime Canal Company, and this we can estimate in part at least.

The Maritime Canal Company will have against us two claims, if we adopt the Nicaragua route and if Article XI of the treaty proposed by Nicaragua remains unaltered. One of these claims will be against the United States directly for violation of the company's alleged concession. This claim the company had already formulated in 1898. At that time a bill was pending looking to this Government becoming chief shareholder of the Maritime Company, compensating it for what work it had done and guaranteeing its bonds. The company then (as appears from Senate Document No. 289, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session) estimated its expenditures, with interest, at $7,000,848.97. It proposed to surrender its rights for $7,000,000 in stock and $4,500,000 in 3 per cent bonds guaranteed by the United States. The stock could be canceled by the United States at any time on payment of par and accrued interest at 3 per cent per annum. As the bonds with the guaranty of the United States would be worth more than par, the total face value of the securities to be issued, $11,500,000, would not equal the cash value of the compensation which the company claimed.

Before the committee the secretary of the Maritime Company and the president of the Nicaragua Company stated that they expected at least the amount expended with interest. This, as I have said, amounted, on the company's computation, on June 1, 1898, to $7,000,848.97. A simple calculation shows that the company's claim on this account on June 1, 1902, would amount to $8,541,757.66. This is wholly exclusive of the additional amount of $4,500,000 which the company claimed in 1898. If this claim, too, be still made the company would look to the Government to pay them more than $13,000,000 if the Nicaragua route be adopted.

It is true that in 1898 the Senate passed a bill limiting the company's compensation to $5,000,000, but the bill never passed the House; it was never accepted by the company and we have no warrant for saying that the company would have accepted it. All that we know is that the Maritime Canal Company has stated its claim upon a basis which would make the amount at this date $13,000,000.

This is wholly outside of its claim against Nicaragua which we are to assume if we accept Article XI of the proposed Nicaraguan treaty. How much these would be we can not even conjecture. Even if the company were to waive all claims against the United States, which it has shown no real intention of doing, this claim against Nicaragua would still remain, and no one can question that, in any case, many millions would be demanded of this Government by the company in one form or another. I express no opinion of the validity of these claims. The former of them has received a sort of sanction by the passage of the bill of 1898 by the Senate. The latter claim has received, also, a sort of sanction by the adoption of the company's protest against the action of Nicaragua by the Secretary of State. I can not believe, however, that if the Nicaragua route be adopted the Maritime Canal Company will fail to obtain, on one ground or another, more or less millions—perhaps many millions—from the Treasury of the United States.

The company's attitude is not to be mistaken. It began its work on a crude, imperfect, and, as we now know, impossible plan. Out of $22,000,000 of stock, it issued only about $1,000,000 for cash. It did some work in the first four years of its existence, and then ceased, and for nine years has made not the slightest attempt to construct a canal. In its annual reports it attributes its inaction to the Government surveys of 1895, 1897, and 1899, which it says produced uncertainty about the route. When the first of these surveys was made work had already been abandoned for two years, a fact which sufficiently disposes of this excuse; but no such excuse could ever serve, for had the company itself been proceeding upon a feasible plan, no number of surveys could have affected it. The real trouble was that its plan was impossible, and therefore it did not proceed.

When Nicaragua declared its concession forfeited in 1900, the company had done no work for seven years; its property on the canal line had been allowed to go to ruin and decay; it was plain that the company could never build its canal and did not intend to spend any more money in that way. But the sentiment for a canal at Nicaragua was strong then in the United States. While the company had no power nor desire to build a canal, it did desire to hold its concessions, for if the United States should adopt the Nicaragua route these exclusive rights of the Maritime Company would bar the way, and it could obtain compensation for abandoning what it could not itself use. Therefore they protested against the forfeiture. Though two years have passed, they have only protested. They have not actively sought an opportunity of resuming work. They do not wish to resume work.

They wish only to hold their concessions as a means of getting millions from this Government.

And for what should we pay these millions, if we did pay them? For nothing. The Isthmian Canal Commission says:

> Nearly all the property of the Maritime Canal Company, including dredges, boats, tugs, etc., has gone to ruin, except the railroad and the 4,350 feet of partially constructed canal. The buildings now standing are in bad condition. Some of them in 1897 were capable of being repaired, and were used by the employees of the Nicaragua Canal Commission and later by the employees of the Isthmian Canal Commission.
> Practically none of the property would have any value to-day in the construction of a canal, except possibly the canal excavation made from Greytown to Lagoon inland, and this would be of value only as a part of a channel for the diversion of the San Juanillo River.

The concessions of the Maritime Canal Company are of no value to this Government; such limited rights will not suffice for our purposes. It has, as we have seen from the Commission's report, no other property of value. So that we shall be called upon to pay these large sums without the United States receiving value therefor to the amount of a penny.

The Senator from Washington minimized these claims of the Maritime Canal Company. He declared them not legal claims, but only founded on broad equities and such as we need never pay if we did not choose. He asserted that the forfeiture of the Nicaragua concession was unquestionably valid and regular, that the company would not press any claim in any case, and that it could not amount to more than four or five millions at most.

But the Senator does not take into account the fact that the Maritime Canal Company has also an exclusive concession from Costa Rica which has never been declared forfeited, but which we must violate if we build the Nicaragua Canal. He declares that the forfeiture of the Nicaraguan concession was perfectly regular, but we must remember that the Secretary of State had as little difficulty in coming to an exactly opposite conclusion. He says that there can be no legal claim in any case, but I can not agree, nor do I think that the Senate can agree, that, if we build a canal where the company has a valid, existing, conclusive concession, there will not be a claim on the part of the company of the most strictly legal character. That will be the situation in Costa Rica if she ever lets us build the Nicaragua-Costa Rica Canal at all. It will be the case in Nicaragua if the Maritime Canal Company's view and the Secretary of State's view of the company's rights there prove to be correct.

The Senator says that the company will press no claim, but the very testimony which he read in support of that statement contains strong assertions of the existence of the claim and a sense of its justice, and in answer to the very question as to the company's intention, the witnesses expressly disclaimed authority to speak except for themselves. To me the testimony seemed clearly to indicate that a claim would be sure to be made. The witnesses certainly were at pains to avoid any statement that it would not.

Finally, the Senator asserted that the claim would only amount to four or five millions. Four or five millions is not a mere trifle, especially when it would be, as in this case, absolutely thrown away without return of any sort. But the Senator paid no attention to Mr. Miller's statement, which, nevertheless, he quoted, that he thought the company should have that amount, at least, with interest. I have shown that this means not four or five millions, but between eight and nine millions, and that this is a minimum which, according to the company's previous demands, means really more than thirteen millions.

Surely such a situation should require us to pause. We can not at all know what the Nicaragua Canal will cost—into many millions. We do know what the Panama Canal will cost. We know the Panama Canal to be the better and more useful as well as the cheaper canal. We know that we can begin at once the work upon the Panama Canal, but we do not know when, if ever, we can begin the Nicaragua Canal.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from South Dakota will permit me, I should like to ask him if he does not recall the testimony of Lyman E. Cooley as to the possibility of letting a contract for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal at the estimate placed upon it by the Commission, and whether he does not regard that as some indication?

Mr. KITTREDGE. I much prefer to rely upon the estimates, judgment, and conclusion of the Isthmian Canal Commission to the judgment even of a man of Mr. Cooley's standing, who went down there simply and solely for the purpose of looking it over for a construction company.

Mr. HARRIS. He said that his company would be willing to construct it at the figures estimated by the Canal Commission. He did not controvert the Commission's figures at all.

Mr. KITTREDGE. He certainly said that, but the Senator from Kansas surely misapprehends the point I am making, especially upon this branch of the case. It is that not only will we be compelled to expend the amount estimated for the actual construction of the canal but we will be compelled to expend many millions in relieving the proposed route from existing concessions, and acquiring by purchase or condemnation lands necessary for the construction of the canal along that route, and that is the uncertain amount, and that will cost many millions which even we can not estimate.

I have listened to the debates in this Chamber and I have read the pamphlets and discussion in the press, but I have never yet heard one single reason given for preferring the Nicaragua route, except that, measured in miles, it makes a shorter route between certain ports of the United States; and this fallacious argument is, I believe, answered by the considerations stated in the views of the minority of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, and which show that, while shorter in miles, that route is for nearly all ports longer in time. For what reason, then, that route is so zealously advocated I am at a loss to conceive.

In common with the other members of the minority of the committee, I desire an isthmian canal, the best canal, and in the shortest possible time. I have no prejudice in favor of either route, but I have been led to the conclusion which I have reached by as careful and impartial a consideration of the case as I could give it. Upon the engineering questions I am content to rest upon the report of the eminent engineers of the Isthmian Canal Commission, and if I rejected their opinion I should have to act in a matter foreign to my own pursuits without advice, for we have no other opinions but theirs. Upon questions of navigation the statements of sea captains submitted by the Senator from Ohio seem to me conclusive. I have no sufficient knowledge and experience of such matters to put against theirs. Upon the questions of concessions and legal difficulties I have found the way open at Panama and absolutely barred at Nicaragua.

Having thus become convinced by the opinions of experts, upon whose advice I must necessarily rely, that the Panama Canal will be the better and more useful as well as the cheaper canal, and having satisfied myself that only by that route is the immediate construction of an isthmian canal possible, I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin. By the adoption of that amendment only I most firmly believe can we realize the desire of the country that the canal be built without delay and that it be the best possible canal.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the Army appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill indicated by the Senator from Vermont, which will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12804) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903.

Mr. PROCTOR. I move that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 13, insist upon its other amendments, and ask for a full and free conference with the House thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 13, which will be stated to the Senate.

Mr. FORAKER. Before any action is taken upon the motion of the Senator from Vermont, I should like to learn from the Senator what, if anything, has been accomplished by the committee appointed upon the subject of the message sent to the Senate by the House?

Mr. PROCTOR. The amendment I move to recede from is amendment No. 13, in which we struck out the language that has ordinarily been used, as follows:

Temporary buildings at frontier stations: For the construction of temporary buildings and stables, and for repairing public buildings at established posts.

We inserted in lieu thereof:

The construction and repair of such permanent or temporary buildings at established posts as the Secretary of War may deem necessary.

The effect of our amendment was to do away with the provision of the statute which limited any expense to $20,000 under the barracks and quarters and made it available the same as the military post fund.

Mr. FORAKER. I am perfectly familiar with that. What I made inquiry about was whether there has been any report by the committee appointed by the Senate to confer with another committee, if the House should appoint one, in regard to the message sent to the Senate by the House, instructing the Senate as to the rules of the House and the right of the Senate to make amendments to bills that the House had passed.

Mr. PROCTOR. The chairman of that committee is present and can speak for the committee. There has been no report made. This motion takes no cognizance whatever of the action of the House.

Mr. GALLINGER. It yields to the contention of the House, though, does it not?

Mr. PROCTOR. It yields to the contention of the House in regard to one amendment and puts the other two which are objected to into conference.

Mr. FORAKER. The House, as I remember it, asked for a full and free conference as to all except three amendments.

Mr. PROCTOR. All except one amendment.

Mr. FORAKER. All except three, I think. I think the House asked for a full and free conference, but instructed their conferees not to confer as to three amendments which the House specified.

Mr. PROCTOR. That is correct.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. PROCTOR. But by this action we take no cognizance at all of their action in the matter. We merely recede from one of the three amendments—amendment No. 13.

Mr. CULLOM. There are other amendments in the bill not disposed of.

Mr. PROCTOR. Oh, yes; there has been no conference. No amendment has been disposed of.

Mr. FORAKER. I supposed that before the Senate took any action providing for the appointment of conferees we would have a report as to the message sent us by the House. I may be unwise in insisting upon taking further notice of that message. It does seem to me that we ought to know that it is disposed of and out of the way before we proceed to have any conference about this bill. I do not think we ought, before there has been an appointment of conferees and a conference, to yield any of the amendments, especially those in controversy.

May I ask the Senator whether or not it is the opinion of the committee appointed by the Senate to consider this message from the House that we should take this action in respect to the pending bill, yielding as to this amendment and asking for a conference as to the other two amendments?

Mr. PROCTOR. This action which I have proposed has no reference whatever to the message and resolution of the House.

Mr. PETTUS. I desire to know whether the Senator from Vermont speaks for the committee or for himself in making this motion.

Mr. PROCTOR. Not at all for the committee of conference that was appointed. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] will speak for that committee. I merely speak as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs in charge of the bill.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I insist that there has been no committee of conference appointed at all on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There has been no conference committee appointed yet. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate recede from the amendment which will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 22, line 9, the Senate struck out the words:

Temporary buildings at frontier stations: For the construction of temporary buildings and stables and for repairing public buildings at established posts.

And in lieu thereof inserted the following:

The construction and repair of such permanent or temporary buildings at established posts as the Secretary of War may deem necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recede.

Mr. FORAKER. I think the Senate ought to know before we act on the motion whether or not anything is to come from the committee of conference that we appointed. If the committee of conference that we appointed will report that they are unable to accomplish anything in the direction it was hoped they might accomplish something, then that is one situation; but if they have not yet completed their labors, it is another. I do not like to see any such action as this taken so long as that committee is still in existence and empowered to act with respect to the message.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, that committee, which has no relation whatever to the bill—it is not a conference committee on the bill——

Mr. FORAKER. Oh, of course, I well understood that it is not a committee of conference on the bill, but it is a committee of conference, as I expressed it, on the message, and it was generally understood, if not determined, by the Senate that we would not ask for a conference nor yield to the request for a conference until the committee of conference on the message had concluded its labors. I simply wanted to know whether its labors had been concluded.

Mr. SPOONER. The labors of the committee of conference have not been concluded, and I am not prepared at this time to make a report. The committee will later report and, I think, a a very clear view of it, and I believe the Senate will undoubtedly agree with its view.

The method which the Senator from Vermont is now pursuing is one which, as he said, he pursues as chairman of the committee which has in charge this bill. It involves no appointment of a conference committee by the request of the House, but the Senator had concluded that the Senate ought to recede from one or perhaps two of its amendments——

Mr. PROCTOR. Only one.

Mr. SPOONER. From one amendment, and ask the House for a conference. That was the course suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. While the committee appointed as a conference committee to confer on the message has no relation to the course which is pursued by the Senator from Vermont, it, perhaps, is as wise a way at this time as can be adopted to facilitate the passage of the bill, which involves a vast appropriation and is very much needed.

Mr. FORAKER. I am sure, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, he will appreciate why I express myself as I do. When the conference committee on the message was appointed it was hoped that their labors might result in our having an opportunity to have a conference on all the questions of difference between the two Houses. Now, the chairman having the bill in charge makes a motion which involves a surrender of at least one of those questions. I was hoping that we would not have to surrender any of them unless we might see fit in conference to do so, and I wanted the conferees on the part of the Senate to have the privilege of going into conference unrestrained by any of the restrictions that are imposed by the message from the House.

Mr. SPOONER. We had a very full and frank and kindly conference—we have had several of them—and while I do not think anything would be gained by making a statement at this time about it, the committee thought they could discover that there was no disposition to insist unduly or to create friction. I think it is wiser to allow the committee to proceed a little longer in this matter.

Mr. FORAKER. One chief purpose I had in interrupting was to learn from the chairman of the committee of conference on the message whether or not this motion did meet with his approval. If, in his opinion, we are not likely to get the result we hoped we might arrive at, then I am prepared to consider this proposition, if it is deemed by the chairman wise to take this action.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not hold myself at all responsible for this action. If it is agreeable to the Senate that the conference committee shall be permitted to continue its labors, I expect that it will ultimately make a report upon which the Senate will undoubtedly act.

Mr. FORAKER. I was hoping we might get that before the bill was disposed of, so that we would have the benefit of the Senator's labors in connection with this measure.

Mr. PROCTOR. I will state for the information of the Senator from Ohio that the two amendments that were included in the instructions of the House are by this motion left for a full and free conference, at our request. We take no action whatever upon their message or resolution. I trust, and have reason to think, that the adoption of this motion will lead to a satisfactory result; and I hope the Chair in his wisdom may appoint the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] as one of the conferees on the bill.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio does not want to be appointed a conferee on any bill where he can not have a full and free conference, and that is the very point in controversy. I am willing to undertake to discharge any duty that may be imposed upon me, but if I am appointed to the discharge of a duty I want to know that I am at liberty to discharge it. To be frank about it, I do not care to be a conferee if I am to meet the conferees from the other House who are instructed in advance prematurely and unqualifiedly not to confer. We might as well make up our minds to do without a conference if that is to be the course of parliamentary procedure.

Mr. PROCTOR. The Senator will see that amendments 14 and 15, which are the ones he perhaps has had a special interest in, we insist upon. We ask for a full and free conference upon those amendments.

Mr. FORAKER. I have not any special interest in any one of the amendments. I was on the committee that reported them; I am familiar with all of them; I believe in all of them; I think every one of them ought to be adopted, and I should like to have a conference that will admit of my undertaking to persuade the conferees on the part of the House that they ought to agree with us about them. That is all I care to say on that point.

If I may be allowed to make an inquiry, in view of what the Senator has said, has he any assurance that we will be allowed to confer about the other two amendments?

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. I address the inquiry to the Senator from Vermont, if the Senator from South Carolina will pardon me for just a moment. I ask the question in view of his statement as to what he has reason to believe. Has he assurance that we will be allowed to confer about the other two amendments? Under all the circumstances I feel warranted in making that inquiry.

Mr. PROCTOR. That is a question I hardly think I ought to answer in full and directly, but I have reason to believe that we can have a satisfactory conference on the other two amendments.

Mr. FORAKER. I shall not press the inquiry further.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I may not be in full possession of the facts, but from the debate on this matter at various times, to which I listened, I got the impression that either the Senate Committee on Military Affairs had persuaded the Senate to adopt amendments which it had no right to do, or that the House had treated the Senate in a very arbitrary and discourteous manner.

I understood from the debate that there was a sufficient desire on the part of Senators here to maintain our just rights and our dignity to refuse to let the House have its way, and we appointed a committee of three by a concurrent resolution to confer with such committee as the House might appoint to consider the relative rights of the two Chambers and the proper method of procedure.

I may be mistaken as to what I understood, but that at least was the impression I received. If I am in error I would be glad for some one to give me some light or to correct my error.

I see the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] here. He had something to say about this matter, and was particularly anxious that the Senate should not surrender its dignity and right. But, according to my understanding of this procedure—and it is a very extraordinary one—the committee which we appointed marched up the hill with banners flying and then, like the King of France, marched down again; and the Senate does not seem to have any rights which it intends to have the House respect.

Now, either we went beyond our proper sphere and invaded the rights of the House or the House has gone beyond its sphere and invaded our rights. I confess I am a little mixed as to which is the aggressor or which is the criminal in this business; but I must say that I think it would be more dignified if the committee, which we appointed after so much discussion, had come in and made a report that they found that the Senate was in error and had transcended its authority; that the Military Committee of the Senate had no right to recommend and get incorporated in the bill the amendment about which we are discussing.

If that is the situation, and the action of the Senator in charge of the bill is a confession that that committee have been in error and that they want to get out of it in this way, of course I have no right to object. I thought we had appointed a dignified and able committee to protect our rights and see that the House treated us with fairness and courtesy and if necessary to let this bill fail rather than surrender any of our rights. If I am mistaken I should like to have somebody give me some information on it.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Vermont what is the objection to our asking for a conference upon all differences? Why should we now in asking for a conference yield one of the questions of difference?

Under the circumstances it seems to me that we are justified in asking for a conference as was proposed by the senior Senator from Massachusetts. I think his motion was exactly the motion that ought to have prevailed when this question first arose. I think it is the motion that ought to prevail now, and I would be glad if he would renew it as a substitute for what has been proposed. Then we can go into conference, and if we think one of these amendments ought to be yielded we can yield it there, and yield it in a way that does not involve any sacrifice of dignity or self-respect. It does seem to me that we can not do it in the presence of such a message as that which was sent to us.

If the Senator from Massachusetts is not disposed to renew his motion, I will renew it as a substitute for the one made by the Senator having the bill in charge.

Mr. HOAR. It seemed to me that if the Committee on Military Affairs were not bellicose enough to fight for the rights of the Senate it hardly became a civilian to do it; so I did not press my motion; but if the Senator from Ohio will renew it I shall gladly vote for it.

Mr. FORAKER. I am a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and while I do not feel at all bellicose—to use the word employed by the Senator from Massachusetts—I do feel that there is an important question here, involving the dignity of the Senate. We acted upon it a few days ago, appointing a committee to confer with a like committee of the House on the message which they sent to us, which was certainly a most unusual and extraordinary communication for one House to send to another.

I do not think the situation has been changed one whit, but that it has been made a great deal worse when, two weeks after that committee was appointed, they come into the Senate and tell us that they are still in conference with the House committee; that they have not concluded their labors; that nothing has yet been accomplished, and it is proposed that we shall now, without any conference, recede from one of the questions about which the House, by its message, gave instructions not only to its conferees, but also to the Senate. I am not disposed to do it. I am bellicose enough for that. If the Senator from Massachusetts is not disposed to renew his motion, I will, if I can resurrect it from the RECORD, make it as a substitute for the motion of the Senator from Vermont, and take the sense of the Senate upon it.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I understand that the committee having the matter in charge relating to the respective rights of the two Houses are not ready to report. They have had, as the chairman stated a moment ago, several very agreeable and pleasant conferences on the subject, but they have not reached any conclusion. Now, in the face of that situation, the Senator from Vermont, in charge of this important bill, in a degree holds out the olive branch. I suppose he does that realizing that the 30th of June will arrive very soon.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator which end of the olive branch is presented to the Senate, the end which is the rod or the end which is the leaf?

Mr. ALLISON. Well, either end. I shall not go into details on that subject. I used that little metaphor perhaps improvidently.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. But now, if the Senator will allow me just a moment, the Senator from Vermont having charge of this bill, and the 30th of June arriving quickly, comes in and says to the Senate that it is not worth while for us to hold this Army bill up between the two Houses so that there will be no appropriations for the Army after the 30th of June, but that we shall at least as respects one of these amendments recede from our contentions. I suppose from his observations, although they were rather delicate and somewhat obscure, he has a right to anticipate that this little proffer that he makes to the other House will be accepted by them in turn; that they will agree to this conference; that we will go in with the bill, important as it is; that the controversy arising out of the mistakes of the House or the assertions of the Senate, whatever it may be, will be dealt with carefully and considerately, and that we will have a full report as to our rights and as to the rights of the House.

I see no great trouble in adopting the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont. I do not think we fall very far short of our duty in doing so and endeavoring, if possible, to secure the passage of this important bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. Before the Senator from Iowa takes his seat I should like to ask him if the action of the Senator in charge of the bill, instead of being the offer of an olive branch to the members of the House, is not the running up of a white flag? If the Senate was wrong why is not the Senate decent and honorable enough to say so, and to say so in plain terms and not dodge out of it in this way?

Mr. ALLISON. The matters relating to details of legislation are necessarily to a degree compromises. We may have been right or the House may have been right and we wrong. We have possession of the bill. Suppose the House had possession of the bill and this controversy was going on between the two Houses, would they not be very likely to make some effort to extricate themselves from the difficulty? Yet it is not a difficulty of the Senate, but a difficulty of the House as well, as we happen to have the bill, they can not take up this question in the House.

Mr. GALLINGER. They created the difficulty.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; they created the difficulty, and with the thermometer as it now is, I for one am somewhat anxious that we shall go on as rapidly as we can, preserving our honor and not showing the white flag, if we can avoid it, and settle the question as respects this appropriation bill. The committee appointed on the part of the Senate to confer, an able committee as it is, is still in existence, as its chairman has informed us, having had some pleasant interviews and expects to have more. It will finally bring in here a report which will vindicate the honor of the Senate, if it needs vindication, which I do not believe.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me, should the bone of contention be taken from the possession of the committee by the Senate surrendering its contention and therefore we facilitate the gracious consent of the House to the passage of this bill, if that would not be an ignominious surrender I do not know what you would call it. Why not let the committee discuss the whole proposition as it was submitted to it after a week's debate here? The Senate considered calmly and deliberately without any passion or heat what its just rights were. Motion after motion was made, and finally the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] prevailed for the appointment of this committee, not in the ordinary way, but by a special resolution calling the attention of the House to the fact that this committee was appointed to consider the differences on the Army appropriation bill and the relative rights of the two Houses and the proper method of proceeding with that difference.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that this committee is considering the question as to whether the House have a right, in the first instance, to instruct their committee and thereby prevent a full and free conference. On that question now they are not ready to report, and they may not be ready for some days. I do not think there is any great humiliation in our proposing to recede from one amendment. In fact, I think we ought never to have adopted it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I agree to that probably, but why not agree to recede from all three?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. ALLISON. I have said all I desire to say.

Mr. FORAKER. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I yield to the Senator. I am only trying to get at the real situation here, the true inwardness, so to speak, of this remarkable condition.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not want to prolong this contention or to keep Congress in session unduly, but it may be remarked in this connection, in answer to what the Senator from Iowa said, that the thermometer is no higher at this end of the Capitol than it is at the other end. We can stay here as long as the other House can.

Mr. ALLISON. I am not sure about that, but I suppose it is true.

Mr. FORAKER. However, I do not want to speak as though such an issue as that indicates might come to pass. I think this is a matter that ought to be proceeded with in an orderly way, a way consistent with the dignity and honor and self-respect of the Senate. I think inasmuch as the committee, which we appointed to confer with a like committee from the House on the message sent us by the House, is not yet ready to report, and inasmuch as it is desired to proceed here, that we should, instead of commencing by surrendering one of the controverted propositions, simply ask that the House will grant a full and free conference on all the amendments made by the Senate to this bill. I think if they will yield as to two of them, they can with equal propriety yield as to all three of them.

In asking the House to give us a conference upon all three amendments, we are not asking anything more than that which we are clearly entitled to. Therefore I send to the Secretary's desk and ask to have read a motion which I offer as a substitute for the motion made by the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion proposed by the Senator from Ohio will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the bill, and ask a full and free conference with the House thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to recede will take precedence of that.

Mr. FORAKER. A motion to recede?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; because it brings the two Houses one step nearer together.

Mr. FORAKER. Is not that rule only applicable after conference committees have been appointed? The Senate passed with amendments a bill that was sent to us by the House of Representatives. The bill has been, with those amendments, returned to the House. The House has refused to concur, and has sent us a message, in which it is stated that it has refused to concur; that it has appointed conferees, and has instructed them not to confer as to three amendments that were adopted by the Senate, but to confer as to all the other amendments. The Senate was manifestly unwilling to act upon such a message as that from the House. The Senate was willing to have a full and free conference, but not willing to have a conference that is less than full and free.

The Senator from Vermont, in offering the motion he made a while ago, did, it is true, provide that one of these controverted propositions should be receded from and requested the House to grant us a conference as to the other two. What I propose is, first, before asking for a conference as to the two, that we ask for what the Senate is manifestly entitled to have—a full and free conference as to all of the amendments. I have no interest in any one of the amendments, except only as every Senator here is interested; but I have a great deal of interest in the great, general, broad proposition that underlies this whole proceeding.

Mr. TILLMAN. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to know if it is in order and whether a Senator has the power, acting by himself, without any conference with his colleagues on the committee, to make this motion to recede at this stage of the proceeding?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not the slightest doubt about its being in order.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from South Carolina ought to remember that the Senator from Vermont does not make this motion as a member of the conference committee which was appointed on the message from the House of Representatives.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does he make it as a member of any conference committee?

Mr. SPOONER. He makes it not as a member of any conference committee, but he makes it as a Senator on the Committee on Military Affairs who had this bill in charge.

Mr. TILLMAN. He makes it as an individual?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir; he makes it as the Senator who has this bill in charge. This bill was not committed to a conference, and never has been sent to a conference. The committee on the message of the House of Representatives expect to report later, and I hope they will be able to report in a manner satisfactory to the Senate; but, like all matters of this sort, which generate more or less feeling, we can not get it settled in a moment. From the fact that we are not making any report at this time it must not be understood that we are at all willing to yield the dignity or the rights of the Senate; but each House is a part of the legislative department, and we must cooperate in doing business if we expect to get along in a courteous and gentlemanly way. The motion made by the Senator from Vermont does not emanate at all from the committee.

Mr. TILLMAN. How can the Senator say that he is not a member of the committee?

Mr. SPOONER. I am not a member of the committee.

Mr. TILLMAN. You are not a member of the committee of conference?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly I am; but this does not come from that committee.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Vermont is a member of that same committee and the Senator from Colorado is a member of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will please address the Chair and observe the rules.

Mr. SPOONER. I guess the Senator from South Carolina has put me out of order now. I do not know.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; the Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Vermont is not only a member of this committee, and he has participated with us in most of our conferences, but he is also a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, which has the bill in charge, and that Senator reported the bill from that committee. He sees fit to make this motion. His motion does not in any wise interfere with the jurisdiction of the committee of conference or conclude the Senate on that matter.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his question of order.

Mr. HOAR. My question of order is that the Army bill is not before the Senate. Perhaps a statement of the situation will show that I am wrong in my facts. It is true that a motion to recede precedes a motion to insist and to ask for a further conference, but you have first to get the bill before the Senate. The conference committee, if I am correctly informed at the desk—and if not my point of order does not lie—have not reported. The Senator from Vermont gets up and makes a motion that the Senate recede from a certain amendment on some bill which is now before a committee of conference.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, this so-called conference committee is not a committee appointed to consider the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I am not speaking of the committee of which the Senator from Wisconsin is chairman, but I am speaking of the committee for which the Senator from Vermont has acted as the representative with reference to this bill.

Mr. SPOONER. There has been no conference committee appointed on the bill.

Mr. HOAR. Has the Nicaragua bill, which was pending before the Senate, been displaced by vote of the Senate and the Army bill taken up for consideration?

Mr. SPOONER. Temporarily.

Mr. HOAR. That could not be done except by unanimous consent or by vote of the majority to displace the canal bill. I rise to a question of order, Mr. President, that the motion of the Senator from Vermont is not in order and is not properly before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order. The bill was sent from the House of Representatives to the Senate with the request that there be a conference. It is now before the Senate. At the request of the Senator from Vermont, the Chair laid the bill before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Then I suppose that laying the bill before the Senate is merely a matter of information, unless the Senate have agreed to take it up. You can not displace a pending measure in that way. It is a very serious proposition if at any time when the Senate has voted to engage in the consideration of a measure and that measure is pending it may lose its place by having some request from the other House laid before the Senate, taken up, and debated. We may debate this question six weeks if the Senate has a mind to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read clause 5 of Rule VII.

The Secretary read as follows:

5. The Presiding Officer may at any time lay, and it shall be in order at any time for a Senator to move to lay before the Senate any bill or other matter sent to the Senate by the President or the House of Representatives, and any question pending at that time shall be suspended for this purpose. Any motion so made shall be determined without debate.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. TILLMAN. There was no "motion so made." We had no vote, but merely a request was made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asked unanimous consent.

Mr. HOAR. Do I understand, then, that the construction given to that rule by the Chair is this: That if the Clerk of the House of Representatives brings over here, when some measure is pending on which we have agreed to vote at a certain time and debate is going on, a dozen bills, each one of those bills in succession may be laid before the Senate and a vote demanded on any motion; twenty motions may be made, and if they are made one after another and the yeas and nays are called the pending business, however important, may be dispensed with until that time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair always lays before the Senate every message that comes from the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOAR. That I understand; but I understand that is a matter ordinarily of information and not to displace the pending business. If the position of the Chair is as I understand it, there is a weapon in regard to the delay of pending business in the power of any Senator, it seems to me, of a most important and dangerous character.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, putting it in a difierent way, the question arises whether or not when a bill brought from the House is laid before the Senate it is in order for a Senator to suspend the pending business under consideration by moving an amendment and then proceeding to discuss it, and when that amendment has been disposed of, proceeding with other amendments one after another indefinitely, discussing them, and thus consuming the whole day. Is that in order?

Mr. ALDRICH. A bill which comes from the House of Representatives is not amendable under our rules without a reference, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. FORAKER. A bill which has just come from the House of Representatives is about to be amended if the proposition of the Senator from Vermont should prevail. He moves, if I understand him, that we recede from an amendment which we have made to the bill, thus restoring the original text. That is an amendment to the bill as it passed the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. A motion to recede is undoubtedly in order where there is a disagreement between the two Houses; but the Senator from Ohio said a motion to amend the bill.

Mr. FORAKER. I am speaking of this as the equivalent in parliamentary effect of a motion to amend whether it is in parliamentary name or not.

Mr. ALDRICH. The course followed in this case has been the course always followed in the Senate within my recollection. The Presiding Officer lays messages from the House of Representatives before the Senate, and a motion to recede from an amendment is always held to be in order.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, this bill was sent over here about three weeks ago, and along with it came a message notifying us that the House had instructed its conferees not to confer about certain amendments. That was such an extraordinary proceeding that the Senate took no action. It was debated here for several days at various times, and finally the Senate passed a resolution appointing a committee of three to confer with a like committee on the part of the House about the differences between the two Houses on the Army bill, if I recollect the phraseology.

Mr. SPOONER. No; if the Senator will pardon me, it was to confer with the House on the message from the House.

Mr. TILLMAN. On the message of the House about the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. SPOONER. Not on the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is only a roundabout way to get at the bill at last.

Mr. SPOONER. No; we were not dealing at all with the amendments.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; it was to deal with the question of the House sending us such a message, which in effect precluded the Senate from any action except to subside and surrender. That is the point; and it is a question now, to my mind, as to whether we had any right to put those amendments on or whether the House had any right to send us such a message. That is all.

So far as the merits of the controversy are concerned, they do not enter into the question—I mean whether these amendments ought to remain in the bill or go out of it. I presume the Senate, if it could get hold of the matter, would vote them out; but the point at issue, as I understand it, is whether we shall surrender our right to amend a House bill.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I have not given up the floor yet. I will yield, with pleasure, but I do not yield in that kind of style.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thought the Senator from South Carolina had yielded the floor. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. TILLMAN. I do.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I am willing the Senator shall finish, or I will make a brief explanation now.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am perfectly willing to let the Senator make his explanation.

Mr. PROCTOR. The motion I made entirely ignores the message of the House and the resolution of the House that is before the committee which was appointed by the Senate, of which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] is the chairman. It entirely ignores that, and leaves that whole matter to the Senate to deal with as it shall see fit.

The motion I made was to recede from this first amendment, leaving the other two, to which the House objected, for a full and free conference. My reason for moving to recede from that amendment is because it is in contravention of an existing statute, and so I thought it was indefensible. While I thought the amendment would have been, if agreed to, a wise and a good one, I thought it strictly indefensible, and, while not surrendering the right of amendment, that it would put us in a much better position to recede from that amendment, which is plainly in contravention of existing law.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do I understand the Senator from Vermont to stand up here and, in cold blood, tell us that we have not the right to amend any bill as we please; and is this anything more than an amendment to existing law?

Mr. PROCTOR. I did not say any such thing.

Mr. TILLMAN. You said it was indefensible.

Mr. PROCTOR. I say I do not think it wise to insist, but wiser to recede from an amendment which really is not defensible.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. FORAKER. I want to say a word in answer to the remark made by the Senator from Vermont about the character of this amendment to the effect that it is indefensible. The question to which he refers in that connection was under consideration in the Committee on Military Affairs. It is true that there is a statute that places a limitation upon the amount that may be expended for the character of buildings that this money is to be devoted to the construction of; but it was the unanimous opinion of the committee, the Senator from Vermont included, that Congress had a right in passing this bill to amend that statute; that it was not necessary for us to repeal that statute; but that we could overcome the effect of it properly and legitimately by a simple provision that in this case this money should be expended in the way here pointed out.

The Senator says that the amendment, otherwise than that it is in conflict with that statute, is a wise and just measure, in his opinion. There can not be any question in my mind but that it is a wise and just measure. We did not pass it because any Senator wanted that there should be any such appropriation of money, but because we were advised of conditions that could not be met otherwise than by such an appropriation of money, and when our attention was called to the statute limiting the amount, we proceeded to legislate, recognizing, as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has just suggested, that it is competent for this Congress to enact a law that will be a repeal or that will override that statute to which reference is made.

It can not be said justly that this amendment is indefensible because it is in conflict with a provision of the existing statute. Nobody presumed so to characterize it in committee. I have no special interest in the amendment; I am perfectly willing that it may go out if it should be thought, after proper consideration of it by those deputed to consider it, that it ought to go out. I have no objection to the conferees striking it out, but I do object to the House striking it out and telling us to strike it out, and sending us a message to the effect that our amendment is indefensible, that it is in violation of the rules of the House, and that we must not commit such a violation of the rules of the House, because they can not any longer tolerate such a practice as that by the Senate of the United States.

It did not seem to me that it would take any longer than the House had an opportunity to recede from that kind of a proposition that it would recede from it; but after a committee, a polite and diplomatic and capable committee such as this body appointed, has been negotiating with a like committee of the House for two or three weeks, they have come in here and said all they can do is to report progress; that they have had a number of very pleasant and agreeable meetings, but they have not reached a conclusion. Thereupon, the Senator from Vermont takes the floor and moves that we recede from one of the amendments—an amendment in which I have no interest personally, and I do not care whether it stays in the bill or not, though I voted to put it in because I thought the public good required that it should go in, and every other member of the committee thought that the public good required that it should go in.

I for one am willing to stay here until the thermometer is higher than it now is before I will yield to any such thing. Therefore it is that I am not making any point of order. I am perfectly willing that the vote shall be taken now or at any other time, and therefore it is, while I am perfectly willing that the Senator from Vermont shall make his motion now, I want also to make my motion, and if it does not get any other vote it will get mine. My own feeling about the matter will at least have been respected whether anybody's else feeling is or not.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, unless I misconstrue the merits of this question, it is not whether we shall retain either one of these three amendments in the act as it shall become a law, but it is a question of whether the Senate will demand and make the House finally surrender to the right of the Senate to amend a House bill. We have been subjected to a message from the House that we have put something on the Army bill which we had no right to put on, which is contrary to law, and, to use the language of the Senator from Vermont, is indefensible, and that the House will not tolerate such insolence on our part. That is the whole sum and substance of the situation.

I for one will vote with the Senator from Ohio that the Senate has the right to amend any bill that the House sends over here. If we find we are wrong in our amendment, I am for taking it off; but until I know that we are wrong I do not propose to be monkeyed out of it in this sort of fashion.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to this question of order, and if necessary, though I do not want to do it, I will take an appeal for the purpose of making it debatable; or perhaps the Senate will allow me to state my view without that formality.

This is certainly one of the most important matters regarding the rights of the Senate and the orderly course of debate. Clause 5 of Rule VII reads:

The Presiding Officer may at any time lay, and it shall be in order at any time for a Senator to move to lay, before the Senate any bill or other matter sent to the Senate by the President or the House of Representatives.

The matter must be sent to the Senate by the President or by the House of Representatives—and any question pending at that time shall be suspended for this purpose. Any motion so made—

That is, made to take up the particular matter by any Senator—shall be determined without debate.

There is nothing in the rule that requires that any other motion in regard to the subject shall be determined without debate, or when it shall be determined, but only the matter of laying it before the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, what has happened in regard to this matter? What brought it up—a message from the House or a motion, may I ask the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A message from the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOAR. A message from the House of Representatives. That message from the House of Representatives is that the House nonconcur in some amendments of the Senate. That we know. That has been laid before the Senate. Does the Chair rule that that brings before the Senate the measure, displacing or suspending existing business, whether it takes one week or six weeks to dispose of it, and that any matter which the House has sent over here may be in turn taken up, debated, and disposed of by a final vote of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair holds that a motion made by any Senator that the Chair lay such a matter before the Senate is in order.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; then all that is pending now, according to the Chair, is a motion to lay the matter before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; the Senator from Vermont asked that the bill be laid before the Senate by unanimous consent. He did not make the motion, and the Chair immediately responded by laying it before the Senate, no objection being made to the request.

Mr. HOAR. Was that done by unanimous consent, or under the authority of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent, as the Chair understood it.

Mr. HOAR. I did not give any consent, and I did not hear the question asked for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No attention was given by any Senator to the request of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair did it in the Chair's right to lay it before the Senate for information? Now, does the Chair hold that any motion which the Senator from Vermont may make, it having been laid before the Senate under the right of the Chair, is to be determined without debate, or only the motion to take it up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Only the motion to take it up.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. Then the matter is before the Senate, and a motion to recede is in order and debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HOAR. Does that displace the existing business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a matter for the Senate to determine, whether it is in conflict with the unanimous-consent agreement, by which the unfinished business is to have the floor from time to time. It is not for the Chair to determine.

Mr. HOAR. Then we have, at least so far as the ruling of the Chair goes, got the statement made that another matter than the canal bill is now lawfully before the Senate, subject to all parliamentary motions and debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes. The Chair under that rule has no doubt, and he never has heard it questioned up to the present time, that any matter laid on the table from the President of the United States or from the House of Representatives might at any time suspend existing business and be laid before the Senate on request of any Senator. And the Chair was just about, before this came up, to lay before the Senate, at the request of the Senator from Massachusetts, a message from the House of Representatives in order that it may be disposed of.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair be good enough to do that now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will do so with great pleasure immediately after this matter is disposed of.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have the Chair do so now.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont.

Mr. HOAR. I have not yielded the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair begs pardon of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me for one minute?

Mr. HOAR. I want to get the parliamentary condition settled.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to give the Senator some information. He was not in the Chamber when this began.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to state that the Chair, as I recollect, was asked by the Senator from Vermont to lay the Army appropriation bill before the Senate. He did not ask unanimous consent. There was no mention made by the Chair about unanimous consent. There was not any motion to take it up. It was simply brought forward and laid before the Senate by the Chair at the simple request of the Senator from Vermont, without any of the formalities which I have mentioned. Now, that is the fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is. That is a correct statement.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair had a right to do that under the rule. But we have not any unanimous consent. Under the right given to the Chair by the rule he laid this matter before the Senate; and the next proposition, as I understand, is that any motion in order upon that bill as it stands is in order and debatable. That is the ruling, if I correctly understand the Chair.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, it did not occur to me when I made the motion that it would lead to debate. I thought it the only practicable way to get out of the unfortunate condition we were in, and I am sure it is not any surrender. The whole question of comity between the Houses is still before the Senate. It is entirely aside of that.

But I dislike to have this matter take the time of the Senate from the canal bill. The Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], I believe, is ready to speak, and I ask that this matter may be laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie on the table.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, just a single word in response to the remark made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] as to the rights of this bill. This bill is entitled to rights not only from having been laid before the Senate as a part of a message from the House of Representatives, but because it was a report of a conference committee.

Several SENATORS. No.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Vermont, I understand, although I was not listening to the debate, made a report from the conference committee that they had been unable to agree.

Several SENATORS. No.

Mr. PROCTOR. The Senator from Wisconsin is chairman of the committee having the matter in charge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was sent to the Senate from the House of Representatives, with the request for a conference.

Mr. ALLISON. The House asked for a conference. It is privileged in that respect.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is privileged in that respect. In every sense it was privileged to be laid before the Senate. The question of consideration could undoubtedly have been raised by the Senator from Massachusetts when it was laid before the Senate, and unless the Senate voted to proceed to the consideration of the bill it could not have been amended. And the question having been once raised——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. My object in dwelling on the point of order and making it clear is this: I understood the Chair in the beginning to hold that the rule that any motion so made should be determined without debate applied to all motions and not merely to the motion to take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not so state.

Mr. HOAR. I must have misunderstood the Chair in that particular. That being so, I do not know that there is any controversy between the Senator from Rhode Island and myself on the general proposition. Then the only question which would come up now, so far as I can see, is whether there is any unanimous consent involved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question of consideration can be raised even on a conference report.

Mr. ALDRICH. Unquestionably. My contention is that in the absence of objection the Chair was entirely right——

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. In laying this message before the Senate, and the Senator from Vermont was entirely right in making the motion to recede.

MARSHALS IN THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2769) to fix the fees of United States marshals in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; which were, on page 1, line 10, to strike out all after "Territory" down to and including the word "hundred," in line 13; on page 2, line 1, to strike out the word "State;" and on page 2, line 1, after the word "decision," to insert "of the Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States."

Mr. HOAR. Those amendments are the merest formal and verbal amendments, not changing the legal effect of the bill in the least. I hope they will be concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Mr. PERKINS obtained the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would not the Senator from California prefer to go on in the morning?

Mr. PERKINS. It is immaterial to me.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There are others who wish to speak to-morrow.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that the Nicaragua Canal bill may be proceeded with immediately after the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be proceeded with immediately after the completion of the routine morning business. Is there objection?

Mr. McCUMBER. I object.

Mr. FORAKER. What is the request?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Was objection made?

Mr. McCUMBER. What is the request?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be proceeded with immediately after the completion of the routine morning business.

Mr. McCUMBER. For how long a time?

Mr. GALLINGER. For the next three days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For the remaining days until the bill is voted upon.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Oregon limited his request to to-morrow.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will modify the request.

Mr. McCUMBER. I shall not object as to to-morrow.

Mr. MITCHELL. I make the request, then, for to-morrow.

Mr. McCUMBER. For to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and the order is made for to-morrow.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. Do I understand that I will have the floor in the morning immediately after the morning business is concluded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair now recognizes the Senator from California, and will recognize him to-morrow morning.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that to-morrow I will submit some remarks on the unfinished business immediately following those of the Senator from California.

REGISTRATION OF VESSELS.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11725) to amend section 4139 and section 4314 of the Revised Statutes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Commerce was on page 1, line 7, after the word "company," to insert "or by an individual or individuals;" in line 11, after the word "behalf," to insert "or the managing owner, or his agent duly authorized by power of attorney, when such vessel is owned by an individual or individuals;" on page 2, line 1, after the word "vessel," to strike out "by such company;" and in line 3, after the word "company," to insert "when such vessel is owned by a corporation;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4139. Previous to granting a register for any vessel owned by any incorporated company, or by an individual or individuals, the president or secretary of such company, or any other officer or agent thereof, duly authorized by said company in writing, attested by the corporate seal thereof, to act for the company in this behalf, or the managing owner, or his agent duly authorized by power of attorney, when such vessel is owned by an individual or individuals, shall swear to the ownership of the vessel without designating the names of the persons composing the company, when such vessel is owned by a corporation, and the oath of either of said officers or agents shall be deemed sufficient without requiring the oath of any other person interested and concerned in such vessel.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 11, after the word "company," to insert "or by an individual or individuals;" in line 15, after the word "behalf," to insert "or the managing owner, or his agent duly authorized by power of attorney, when such vessel is owned by an individual or individuals;" in line 18, after the word "vessel," to strike out "by such company," and in line 19, after the word "company," to insert "when such vessel is owned by a corporation;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4314. Previous to granting enrollment and license for any vessel owned by any incorporated company, or by an individual or individuals, the president or secretary of such company, or any other officer or agent thereof, duly authorized by said company in writing, attested by the corporate seal thereof, to act in its behalf, or the managing owner, or his agent duly authorized by power of attorney, when such vessel is owned by an individual or individuals, shall swear to the ownership of such vessel without designating the names of the persons composing such company, when such vessel is owned by a corporation, which oath shall be deemed sufficient without requiring the oath of any other person interested or concerned in such vessel.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

SANTA FE PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10299) authorizing the Santa Fe Pacific Railroad Company to sell or lease its railroad property and franchises, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I desire to offer certain amendments, mainly of a verbal character. They are indicated on the paper which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The amendments proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 2, line 24, after the word "Arizona," insert "respectively;" in the same line, after the word "of," insert "main;" in line 25, after the word "Territories," insert "respectively;" on page 3, line 4, after the word "sold," insert "and the rolling stock used thereon, but excepting;" in line 6, after the word "tax," insert "as to each Territory;" in line 8, after the word "until," strike out "the said Territories, or either of them" and insert "it shall;" and in line 9, after the word "as," strike out States and insert "a State;" so as to read:

That from and after the passage of this act the said Santa Fe Pacific Railroad Company, its successors or assigns, shall pay an annual tax at the rate of $175 per mile to the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, respectively, for each mile of main track in said Territories, respectively, the same to be apportioned among the counties of said Territories in which said railroad is located according to the mileage in each county, respectively, and said taxes shall be in lieu of all other taxes on said property hereby authorized to be leased or sold and the rolling stock used thereon, but excepting the land-grant lands and shops, as hereinafter otherwise provided, and the payment of the said tax as to each Territory shall be made on or before the 1st day of December of every year after 1902 until it shall have been admitted into the United States of America as a State, etc.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I think the Senator who called up the bill had better make an explanation of it. Some Senators seem to be in doubt as to what it means.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, this is a bill to authorize the Santa Fe Pacific Railroad Company, which runs from Albuqurque to a point just within the borders of California, to sell or lease its property and franchises to the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad Company. The Santa Fe Pacific Railroad Company is the successor of the old Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company. The Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Company now owns and has for many years owned all of the bonds and all of the stock of this company, and this bill is to authorize a nominal transfer of the property and franchises of the company to the real owner, for the purpose of avoiding the duplication of officers and the maintenance of a separate line of railway where no such corporation is needed.

This authority has been given by the State of California and, as I am informed, the State of Kansas, and the action of Congress in the matter is necessary only because the line of this railway, which is and has for many years been a part of the main track of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe, lies within the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona.

I will say also that the Delegates from both those Territories have approved of this legislation and are anxious to have it enacted. I will say, in addition, that it was so entirely free from objection that it passed the House of Representatives by a unanimous vote.

Mr. PETTUS. I should like to have the Senator explain why it is that it is necessary to state how much tax shall be paid.

Mr. DOLLIVER. That was done as a special fayor to save the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona from a controversy about taxes with this company, and the railroad company agreed to it, although it raises the tax which they are now paying, I think, $50 a mile.

Mr. PETTUS. What are the taxes now paid a mile?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I think $125 a mile, and this raises it to $175 a mile by agreement between all the parties interested. It saves an ugly controversy, and I think the rate imposed is adequate.

Mr. PETTUS. Has not the law heretofore been that the Territory should tax as it saw fit?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I believe that is true. I think under the charter, however, this road was entirely exempt from taxes within those Territories. I am so informed by a gentleman who is very familiar with the Territory of Arizona.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 15004) to authorize the Minneapolis, Superior, St. Paul and Winnepeg Railway Company, of Minnesota, to build and maintain a railway bridge across the Mississippi River.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that this bill came over to-day from the House.

Mr. NELSON. And it was substituted on the Calendar for a similar Senate bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is not at present in possession of the clerks. The Chair is informed that it has gone to the printer.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. HOAR. I am authorized by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] to move that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 113) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for a monument to the soldiers of Worcester County who served in the war for the Union, to be surmounted by an equestrian statue of the late Maj. Gen. Charles Devens, United States Volunteers, and I ask that the joint resolution be put upon its passage. I am authorized by the Senator from Vermont to make the motion. It is a copy precisely of the bill just passed in regard to the monument in the State of New Jersey.

Mr. BERRY. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts how long the joint resolution has been before the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. HOAR. The joint resolution was introduced last Thursday and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It has been examined by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], who authorized me to make this motion. I am going away, and I desire very much to get the bill through. It is an exact copy of the bill just passed in regard to the monument of the late Senator from New Jersey, General Sewell, and such a bill, I believe, invariably, as a matter of course, if the condemned cannon are in the possession of the Department, is always passed on request.

Mr. BERRY. I make no objection to it. I was just a little curious to know about discharging the committee by order of the Senate. It has not been customary unless they had charge of the measure for a great while.

Mr. HOAR. I want very much to get it through the House this week if I can.

Mr. BERRY. Certainly; I do not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Committee on Military Affairs will be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution, and it will be read.

The joint resolution was read; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. HOAR. After the words "Worcester County," in line 9, I move to insert "Massachusetts."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for a monument to the soldiers of Worcester County, Mass., who served in the war for the Union, to be surmounted by an equestrian statue of the late Maj. Gen. Charles Devens, United States Volunteers."

EXPENDITURES IN CUBA.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I present a communication addressed to me by the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of receipts and expenditures in Cuba for the months of May and June, 1900, and also requesting that an appropriation of $10,000 be made to enable the War Department to continue the preparation of the report of expenditures in Cuba since April 30, 1900. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, to be considered in connection with the general deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 17, 1902, at 11 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate June 16, 1902.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 16, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, June 14, was read, corrected, and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS FOR THURSDAY NEXT ET SEQ.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. COOPER, chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, submits the following request for unanimous consent:

That immediately after the reading of the Journal on Thursday, June 19, and each day thereafter until and including Thursday, June 26, the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate bill 2295.

That general debate on said bill shall continue for five days.

That after Thursday, June 19, and during the continuance of this order, the House shall meet each day at 11 o'clock, and at 5 o'clock on each day a recess shall be taken until 8 o'clock for evening sessions, which evening sessions shall continue not later than 10.30 p. m., and be devoted to debate only on said bill.

That on Wednesday, June 25, the House in Committee of the Whole shall immediately proceed with the consideration of the said bill under the five-minute rule; that consideration of the text of the Senate bill for amendment shall be waived, and the Committee of the Whole shall proceed to consider, for discussion and amendment by sections the substitute amendment proposed by the Committee on Insular Affairs: Provided, however, That at any time amendments may be offered on behalf of said committee to any part of said substitute amendment.

That at 4 o'clock on Thursday, June 26, the Committee of the Whole shall rise and report said bill and all pending amendments to the House, and thereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and all pending amendments thereto, including one amendment in the nature of a substitute to be offered by the minority of the Committee on Insular Affairs, to final disposition without intervening motions.

That leave is hereby granted to all members speaking on said bill to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Provided, That this order of the House shall not interfere with the consideration of appropriation or revenue bills, conference reports, or Senate amendments to House bills. If, however, the consideration of any such bills or reports consumes an hour or more of the time of the House on any day during the continuance of this order then the time for the consideration of the bill S. 2295 and the time for reporting the same to the House by the Committee of the Whole shall be correspondingly extended. Such extension of time to apply to the debate under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to the House——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The right to object is reserved, of course.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That this resolution has the unanimous approval of the Committee on Insular Affairs.

Mr. HILL. I desire to reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HILL. As I understand the rule, it provides for action on the bill without any amendment except such amendments as are proposed by the committee. Am I correct?

The SPEAKER. That is not the effect of the rule at all.

Mr. HILL. Will it be in order to move an amendment to the substitute, so far as the coinage provisions are concerned, under the rule?

The SPEAKER. If it is reached in Committee of the Whole, it will be.

Mr. DINSMORE. Is it not the effect of the resolution that the substitute shall be open only to amendments of the committee?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is the way I understood it, and that is why I want to inquire about it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is not the effect of the rule. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the House to the phraseology of the rule:

That on Wednesday, June 25, the House, in Committee of the Whole, shall immediately proceed with the consideration of the said bill—

That is, the Senate bill—

under the five-minute rule; that consideration of the text of the Senate bill for amendment shall be waived, and the Committee of the Whole shall proceed to consider, for discussion and amendment, by sections, the substitute amendment proposed by the Committee on Insular Affairs.

The effect of that is to bring the House to the immediate consideration, under the five-minute rule, of the bill reported by the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House for amendment by sections.

When the committee amendments are disposed of the bill shall be taken up and voted on at 4 o'clock.

Provided, however, At any time amendments may be offered on behalf of said committee to any part of said substitute amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Let me ask the gentleman if the effect of that proposition is not to enable the Insular Committee, if it sees fit to do so, to have amendments pending during the entire two days that the bill is open for amendment under the five-minute rule, engrossing the entire time, so that other amendments can not be offered.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that nothing is further from the intention of the Committee on Insular Affairs than the course indicated by the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, then, I accept that statement.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Speaking for myself, as chairman of the committee, if I may be permitted to control the conduct of affairs on behalf of the committee, nothing of that kind will be tolerated.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I accept that; therefore I shall not object, inasmuch as the minority members of the Committee on Insular Affairs have agreed to this rule; but I do desire to say that there is a serious objection to a rule with this provision, that at the end of two days, at the hour fixed by this rule, the bill must be reported from the Committee of the Whole House to the House of Representatives and a vote taken. Now, suppose at that hour the completion of the bill has not been had in the Committee of the Whole; in other words, suppose that the committee has not completed the reading of the House bill, under the five-minute rule for amendments. If the rule is agreed to, it must be reported, and possibly one-half of the bill not read in the Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule. Now, that is not right.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say for the information of the gentleman from Tennessee that that view of the situation was all discussed in the Committee on Insular Affairs. There are many sections of the bill to which there will be no amendment offered, which is perfectly apparent on reading the bill, such as to confirm the acts of the President in appointing the Commission and confirming laws passed by the Commission.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have no doubt that is true.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There are, however, some sections to which amendments will undoubtedly be offered.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I hope the consideration of the bill will be completed under the five-minute rule in the two days, but I do not believe that we should have agreed—that the committee should have agreed—to a proposition which brings us arbitrarily to a vote at a given hour, whether we have completed the reading of the bill or not for amendment. But I shall not object.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The objection of the gentleman from Tennessee is applicable to every rule brought in here on the part of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Oh, no. We ought not to have had a rule that did not provide for completing the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule. We ought to complete it. That is the proper way.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will say to the gentleman it is the unanimous opinion of the minority of the committee that two days under the five-minute debate, beginning at 11 o'clock in the forenoon, would suffice to complete the bill by sections for amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understood from the reading of the rule, and evidently several of my colleagues so understood, that no amendment would be allowed to the bill at any time unless offered by members of the Insular Committee. Is that so?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman misapprehends the purpose entirely.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am glad that I misunderstood it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish the gentleman would yield to me.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that the reason I will not object to this rule, although there is good reason, is because the minority members of the Insular Committee have agreed to accept the rule as it is. The rule, it is true, may be used by the majority of the Committee on Insular Affairs to prevent any amendment being offered which this House or individual members may wish, if they desire to do so, by consuming the entire two days on committee amendments.

The rule provides that the committee may offer as an amendment to the whole bill a bill that is satisfactory to the minority of this House, to be voted upon, and therefore we on this side of the House have an opportunity to offer what we believe is a fair solution of this proposition. It has been nearly four years since the United States has had control of the Philippine Islands. We have been governing them by military government, by arbitrary rule, by czar-like power, and this is the first opportunity that the Republican party has given in this House for us to come to a proposition where we can offer an amendment to govern them by civil authorities. The rule, so far as we are concerned, provides that we may offer our substitute; and I believe that the minority members of the Insular Committee were correct in accepting this proposition.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

REBECCA J. TAYLOR.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, I present a report on privileged resolution No. 295, and I move that the same lie on the table.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows;

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, respectfully requested to communicate to the House of Representatives the causes and reasons for the dismissal of Rebecca J. Taylor from her position in the classified service in the War Department, if not incompatible with the interests of the public service.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. And on that, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 109, nays 85, answered "present" 14, not voting 143; as follows:

So the motion to lay the resolution on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. WANGER, and I desire to change my vote from "no" to "present."

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in his seat and listening for his name when it should have been called?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I was.

The SPEAKER. And failed to hear it?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I did.

The SPEAKER. Call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. COOPER of Texas, and he voted "no" as above recorded.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in his seat, listening, and failed to hear his name when it should have been called?

Mr. SIBLEY. I was listening and failed to hear it.

The Clerk called Mr. SIBLEY's name, and he voted "aye" as above recorded.

The following pairs were announced:

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I desire unanimous consent to call up from the Speaker's table the naval appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. What is the object?

Mr. FOSS. My object is to ask unanimous consent that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to taking up these amendments. The question now is on the request of the gentleman from Illinois, that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference with the Senate. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. FOSS, Mr. DAYTON, and Mr. MEYER of Louisiana as conferees on the part of the House.

AMENDMENTS TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION ACT.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass with an amendment Senate resolution No. 105.

The joint resolution (S. 105) supplementing and modifying certain provisions of the Indian appropriation act for the year ending June 30, 1903, was read as amended, as follows:

In addition to the allotments in severalty to the Uintah and White River Utes of the Uintah Indian Reservation in the State of Utah, the Secretary of the Interior shall, before any of said lands are opened to disposition under any public land law, select and set apart for the use in common of the Indians of that reservation such an amount of nonirrigable grazing lands therein at one or more places as will subserve the reasonable requirements of said Indians for the grazing of live stock.

All allotments hereafter made to Uncompahgre Indians of lands in said Uintah Indian Reservation shall be confined to agricultural land which can be irrigated, and shall be on the basis of 80 acres to each head of a family and 40 not allotted to Indians or used or reserved by the Government, or occupied for school purposes, shall be opened to exploration, location, occupation, and purchase under the mining laws.

In addition to the allotment in severalty of lands in the Walker River Indian Reservation in the State of Nevada, the Secretary of the Interior shall, before any of said lands are opened to disposition under any public-land law, select and set apart for the use in common of the Indians of that reservation such an amount of nonirrigable grazing lands therein at one or more places as will subserve the reasonable requirements of said Indians for the grazing of live stock.

In addition to the allotments in severalty to the Uintah and White River Utes of the Uintah Indian Reservation in the State of Utah, the Secretary of the Interior shall, before any of said lands are opened to disposition under any public-land law, select and set apart for the use in common of the Indians of that reservation such an amount of nonirrigable grazing lands therein at one or more places as will subserve the reasonable requirements of said Indians for the grazing of live stock.

All allotments hereafter made to Uncompahgre Indians of lands in said Uintah Indian Reservation shall be confined to agricultural land which can be irrigated, and shall be on the basis of 80 acres to each head of a family and 40 acres to each other Indian, and no more. The grazing land selected and set apart as aforesaid in the Uintah Indian Reservation for the use in common of the Indians of that reservation shall be equally open to the use of all Uncompahgre Indians receiving allotments in said reservation of the reduced area here named.

In so far as not otherwise specially provided, all allotments in severalty to Indians, outside of the Indian Territory and Oklahoma Territory, shall be made in conformity to the provisions of the act approved February 8, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes," and other general acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, and shall be subject to all the restrictions and carry all the privileges incident to allotments made under said act and other general acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto.

The item of $70,064.48 appropriated by the act which is hereby supplemented and modified, to be paid to the Uintah and White River tribes of Ute Indians in satisfaction of certain claims named in said act shall be paid to the Indians entitled thereto without awaiting their action upon the proposed allotment in severalty of lands in that reservation and the restoration of the surplus lands to the public domain.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded on the motion to suspend the rules?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I demand a second.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN]——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will recognize the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE] to control the time in opposition to the motion.

The SPEAKER. The time will be controlled on the one side by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] and on the other by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, this is the same resolution that I attempted a week or two ago to have passed by unanimous consent, and to the consideration of which objection was made. The resolution relates to provisions of the Indian appropriation act, which were inserted as amendments in the Senate after it had left this House. To those provisions the House conferees objected as a whole, and also objected to certain parts of them as they were finally agreed upon. But it became necessary for the House conferees to concede what the Senate conferees demanded in order to reach an agreement, as it is frequently necessary for the conferees of the one House or the other to yield to those of the other.

After the conference report had been agreed to in both Houses and the bill had gone to the President, a conference, at which I was not present, was held between certain of the conferees and the President of the United States, at which the President raised certain objections to these amendments, and in order to meet the objections of the President this resolution was prepared. It was a concession by the Senate conferees and the Senate, a recession from the position they had taken when the amendments were originally passed and when the conference report was finally agreed to.

The resolution is so plain in its terms that I need not recite its provisions. What it amounts to is this: The Senate has receded from the position which it took originally and which its conferees thereafter took when the conferees met, and the Senate has agreed to this recession and now the House is asked to coincide.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. What evidence have we that the Senate has agreed to recede?

Mr. SHERMAN. They have passed this resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This is a Senate resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. They have agreed, then, to recede from their amendments and passed this resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the position exactly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. As I understand the gentleman, the President, notwithstanding his objections to the Indian appropriation bill, approved it with these obnoxious provisions in it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, I think he approved it with the expectation, if not the understanding, that this resolution would be passed. It had passed the Senate when he signed the appropriation bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Was there any contract to that effect?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, certainly not. No individual could make a contract for the House. I say the bill was approved with that expectation. The Senate had passed this resolution; and when the President told me he would approve the Indian appropriation bill, I frankly told him that I believed the House would agree to the resolution. I did not undertake to make any such agreement on the part of the House by any manner of means; I simply stated my belief.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This is the third joint resolution, is it not, which has been passed to amend the Indian appropriation bill since it was passed?

Mr. SHERMAN. The second.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This is the third, if I mistake not.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; a resolution did come in here before, but it never passed; and it is embodied in this resolution. Resolution No. 2 is embodied in this. It never did pass the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But this is the third effort to amend that act?

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman is right. This is the third effort to change the bill as originally passed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if he can give us the assurance now that this is the final one?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I can give the gentleman my assurance that this is the last one I shall offer.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Then, as I understand it, this makes the bill satisfactory to the President.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand so. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will ask the gentleman if he will agree to an amendment in line 8, page 3, adding the word "Oklahoma"——

Mr. SHERMAN. That is included in the resolution as it has been read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE] is recognized.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, the pending resolution within itself is unobjectionable as far as I am concerned, and has been explained by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] as I understand it. The original objection to the passage of this resolution, so far as it emanated from myself, was inspired by the hope that the President would see his way clear to veto the appropriation bill. I was encouraged in that hope by a statement that appeared in one of the city papers—whether authorized or not I do not know—that the President was objecting to the concessions made to the lessees on the Uintah Reservation. I believe that the President ought to have vetoed the original bill on that account. I hoped that that objection, added to the provisions covered by this resolution, would inspire him to do that, which I believed to be a very proper thing for him to do.

I believe the ratification of the leases and privileges given to the Florence Mining Company can not be justified on any ground. They have made no investitures; they simply get that which ought to belong to the public generally when this reservation is opened. For that reason, and having no further opportunity or hope of securing that result, I do not feel justified in going further in opposition to this particular resolution. I regret very much that the President in his wisdom did not see proper to put his pungent pen against that bill and expose what I believe to be the infamy wrapped up in the Florence Mining Company lease and the Raven Mining lease. These two companies get a vast concession. They are practically, as I believe, one company, as I have been led to believe since the passage of the original bill. The presidents are the same, the secretaries are the same, and I think the companies are the same; that is, the same in interest, if not the same in name. I believe it is a bad precedent, I believe it is unholy, I believe the requirement of these leases, as I indicated before in my remarks, can be tracked with infamy from their very beginning up to this very morning, and I do not believe that Congress ought to have approved the measure; and when it did approve the bill with these provisions in it, I believe the President ought to have vetoed it, and I regret he has not done so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, does not the gentleman know that if this reservation had been thrown open, without any provision giving the Florence Mining Company any preferential rights, the Florence Mining Company being acquainted with the reservation property, knowing exactly what they wanted, having the same right to go into the reservation and make locations as any other citizen, which locations would be unlimited in number, whatever is granted to it under this bill is nothing more than a formal concession? In other words, that the Florence Mining Company or their agents, knowing exactly what they wanted to locate, would be naturally put in a better situation to take advantage of the provisions of this bill with respect to locating mining claims than anybody else and would get these 640 acres anyhow. In view of that, I want to ask the gentleman whether he thinks the President of the United States or this House ought to stand in the way of opening a great reservation like that to settlement rather than to give this company what is a mere formal concession to go there and locate 640 acres of land, which they probably would locate anyhow?

Mr. LITTLE. I will be pleased to answer the gentleman. I will say that the very suggestion he makes is one of the strongest possible arguments against the policy of giving permits to prospect and locate leases on Indian reservations.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I agree with the gentleman. The leasing system is absolutely indefensible.

Mr. LITTLE. I know that the gentleman agrees with me. I know that the gentleman agrees with me that this is as dirty as it can be, if he would but acknowledge it. You want the reservation open. I think it ought to be opened, and in these leases, as written, the very provision reserving to Congress the right to negotiate with these Indians upon the reservation, instead of giving these direct concessions by this law—I admit they are in possession of information they could use when the reservation is opened. Other people may be in possession of that information, but I would not give them this absolute right for more than a year to go in there and locate their claims in advance. If they have the information, which they have gotten, as I believe, infamously, in a large measure, they would have to use that information when that reservation was opened according to the forms of law, and I would not give them an additional year until October, 1903, to go on and further prospect that reservation and increase the advantages that they have over other people.

But that question is behind us, and knowing my friend as I do I verily believe he agrees with me generally that these leases are unfortunate—that it would have been better for the reservation and better for the country if they had never been made—and it would be better for Congress if they had never been approved; but believing as he does, and as many do, that it would be impossible to secure the opening of this reservation and the consent of these Indians in any other way except by ratifying these agreements, I can see why he is willing to take the dose whether it tastes very well or not. That is the situation. These companies hold up the Government, that is what they do. We understand that it is impossible to secure the consent of these Indians under the influence of these lessees in any other way except to recognize their right. I would not do that.

I now yield five minutes to my friend from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, in addition to what the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE] has said, I wish to say that I am further opposed to this bill because it will permit the grazing lands in these reservations to be leased to cattle men or to anyone else who will lease them. We had a sample of that kind of work by the Secretary of the Interior in Oklahoma. The act of June 6, 1900, opening part of that Territory, excepted and reserved 480,000 acres of land for grazing purposes for the Indians, to be used by the Indians for grazing purposes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this resolution permits the leasing of lands?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It will permit that to be done by the Secretary of the Interior. He can usurp that power as he did in Oklahoma. It is the same language as we find in the bill of June 6, 1900, and the Secretary of the Interior will find the same authority, and we will find that these reservations set apart by this resolution to these Indians for grazing purposes will be leased by the same Secretary of the Interior to cattle men within sixty or ninety days, as they did in Oklahoma.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But I call the attention of the gentleman to the language of the resolution, that the Secretary of the Interior shall—

Select and set apart for the use in common of the Indians—

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is the exact language which you will find in the Oklahoma bill, and the Secretary can lease these Indian lands in the same way that he did those lands, and he will lease them to white men for grazing purposes, and to parties who should not have them, just as he did in the Oklahoma case.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But it proceeds further—for the use in common of Indians of that reservation, such an amount of nonirrigable grazing lands therein, at one or more places, as will serve the requirements of said Indians for the grazing of live stock.

That means the grazing of their own live stock.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will turn to the Oklahoma bill—the law of June 6, 1900—he will find the exact language copied into this bill. The Secretary of the Interior construed that law to mean that he had the right to set apart agricultural lands for grazing purposes and to lease them for grazing to two or three white men, which he did. He located this reservation on Red River, on the very best agricultural lands in that Oklahoma Indian reservation, fronting that river for 30 miles, and then he leased it to two millionaire cattlemen, who have it in their possession to this day.

He did that over the written protest of the entire Texas delegation in Congress and also in the Senate, and Senator Chilton and I presented the protest to him with our objections, calling his attention to the same language that is in this bill here; but that did not deter him and did not stay his hand, and to-day that magnificent territory of 400,000 acres of agricultural land is in the possession of a few millionaire cattlemen in Oklahoma.

I warn the gentlemen from Utah and Washington now that if this resolution passes they will meet with a like fate in the reservations of their own States. There is no restriction upon the amount of land that can be set apart as grazing lands by this resolution. In the case of Oklahoma the bill provided that but 480,000 acres should be set apart for grazing purposes. In this bill the amount is unlimited.

If the Secretary of the Interior sees fit to do so, he can set apart every acre of these reservations for grazing purposes; but, mind you, the Indians will not get the grazing lands. It will be the white men who want and will lease those lands, as has been the case, as I have stated heretofore, in Oklahoma.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In the Oklahoma case there was no provision that the Secretary of the Interior should set aside nonirrigable lands.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That said "pasture lands."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But in this bill it says "nonirrigable lands," which means mountain lands which can not be used for agricultural purposes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The Oklahoma bill used the term "pasture lands," and this says "nonirrigable lands." Now, as we understood that bill of June 6, 1900, at the time it was passed, and as the members of Congress who protested against setting apart the agricultural land on Red River as pasture lands understood it, we did not suppose it would permit the Secretary of the Interior to set apart the best farming lands in the country; but before we left Washington, before the adjournment of Congress in 1901, we ascertained that he intended to set apart agricultural lands and leave the grazing lands to be opened for settlement, and we framed a protest against the setting it apart on Red River adjoining Texas. But he overruled that protest and leased these cattlemen this agricultural land exactly where they wanted it, at their own instance, and I believe at their request. They took possession of it and have had it from that day until this.

Not only that, but 40,000 acres of good farming land were set apart by him near and adjoining the town of Duncan, a town of 2,000 inhabitants, and begining not more than a mile west from that town. It was ascertained by the merchants of that town that certain cattlemen had combined together for the purpose of getting that 40,000 acres. These merchants raised a common fund and presented a bid themselves. They bid more than the cattlemen for the land. They have now leased it out to farmers for farming purposes. These lands were agricultural lands and the very best land in that part of the reservation.

These farmers now have it, and the citizens of that town, the merchants and business men of the town of Duncan, were forced to lease these lands to prevent having a cow pasture in front of the town. Here is a bill with the same provision as that bill, that will permit the Secretary of the Interior, under the guise of turning the land over to the Indians for grazing purposes, to lease every inch of these Utah and Washington Indian reservations to cattlemen or sheepmen for grazing purposes. I warn the gentlemen from Utah and from Washington that the same may be their fate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and agreeing to the resolution with the amendment incorporated therein.

The question was taken, and (in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the resolution was passed.

PENSION OF REMARRIED WIDOWS.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I ask to take up the bill 12141, to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana, by direction of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12141) to amend an act entitled "An act amending section 4708 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to pensions to remarried widows," approved March 3, 1901.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4708 of the laws of the United States governing the granting of Army and Navy pensions, be, and the same is, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4708. The remarriage of any widow, dependent mother, or dependent sister entitled to pension shall not bar her right to such pension to the date of her remarriage, whether an application therefor was filed before or after such marriage; but on the remarriage of any widow, dependent mother, or dependent sister having a pension such pension shall cease: Provided, however, That any widow who was the lawful wife of any officer or enlisted man or other person in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States, as described in paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, during the period of his service in any war, and whose name was placed or shall hereafter be placed on the pension roll because of her husband's death as the result of wound or injury received or disease contracted in such military or naval service, and whose name has been or shall hereafter be dropped from said pension roll by reason of her marriage to another person who has since died or shall hereafter die, or from whom she has been heretofore or shall be hereafter divorced, upon her own application and without fault on her part, and if she is without means of support other than her daily labor, as defined by the acts of June 27, 1890, and May 9, 1900, shall be entitled to have her name again placed on the pension roll at the rate now provided for widows by the acts of July 14, 1862, March 3, 1873, and March 19, 1886, such pension to commence from the date of the filing of her application in the Pension Bureau after the approval of this act: And provided further, That where such widow is already in receipt of a pension from the United States she shall not be entitled to restoration under this act: And provided further, That where the pension of said widow on her second or subsequent marriage has accrued to a helpless or idiotic child, or a child or children under the age of 16 years, she shall not be entitled to restoration under this act unless said helpless or idiotic child, or child or children under 16 years of age, be then a member or members of her family and cared for by her, and upon the restoration of said widow the payment of pension to said child or children shall cease."

SEC. 2. That the provisions of this act shall be extended to those widows otherwise entitled whose husbands died of wounds, injuries, or disease contracted during the period of their military and naval service, but who were deprived of pension under the act of March 3, 1865, because of their failure to draw any pension by reason of their remarriage.

SEC. 3. That no claim agent or other person shall be entitled to receive any compensation for services in making application for pension under this act.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman what is the object of the bill. It is a very long bill. I demand a second.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. The act of March 3, 1901——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee demands a second.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the act of March 3, 1901, attempted to place all remarried widows of soldiers who had drawn pensions who were the wives of soldiers during the soldiers' service when they became widows again upon the pension roll. It was found in the execution of the law there were two classes excluded that were meant to be included when the act was passed. The two classes are, first, if during the period of second widowhood there were minor children who drew a pension of $2 a month during their minority, they are excluded from this act, although they are widows and dependent. The purpose of this act is to amend the act of 1901, so that the widow who was the wife of the soldier during his service, notwithstanding the minor children may have drawn a pension for a time. may, if she is now in necessitous circumstances, be placed on the pension roll the same as other widows. The purpose of this law is not to grant any new right. It only allows all widows who were the war wives, if again widows, to be relieved notwithstanding remarriage.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, what provision is there in this bill which says that she must be in dependent circumstances?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. The only amendment we propose is that any widow who was the living wife of any officer or enlisted man in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, etc., in the United States. Now we add officer, enlisted man, or other person in the Army, Navy, etc. It simply brings in the widow, notwithstanding the children may have drawn pensions.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will my friend please read that part of the bill—I have not one, and no one about me seems to have a copy—which says that the widow on the second occasion must be in necessitous circumstances to be eligible to this pension?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. If I had the act of March 3, 1901, I could do so.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. She may marry a millionaire, and because she becomes a widow a second time she is eligible to pension.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. This is simply the general law. Besides, the act of March 3, 1901, was passed on the theory that a woman who stayed at home and cared for the family, kept the children together, awaiting news from the battlefields of the South, was doing as great and patriotic an act as her husband who was the soldier, and has as good a standing for pension as the soldier himself.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Suppose that she marries a second time, and she marries an absolutely rich man, and he dies and leaves her rich. Now, under this law what is to prevent her from obtaining a pension the same as if she were dependent?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Under the general law she is precluded, and I think by the terms of this bill—I will read the bill a little later as to that provision—but so far as I am concerned, I would not care if the woman who stayed at home and endured the hardships while her husband was in the service; I would not care if she was as rich as Crœsus, I would give her the pension. The law does not consider the financial condition of a soldier under the general law, and I think should not in the case of the war wife. She should have a standing of her own.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not think the Government owes her a cent or ought to pay her a cent.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think no such condition as the gentleman from Tennessee suggests can arise. In the first place, if she was pensioned originally because of the death of her husband, caused by his service, the pension would only be the small pension of a widow under those circumstances. If she is pensioned as a dependent in the first instance, it would be only $100 a year, as I understand the law. It only reinstates her for the small amount, in any event, and as for the large amount, if she has an income beyond $250 a year, she could not be pensioned under this law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from Ohio says she is "pensioned in any event." I hope the gentleman does not mean to state exactly that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not say she was pensioned in any event. I said in any event she would only be pensioned for the amount she was pensioned in the former adjudication, and if she had an income of more than $250 a year this law would not reinstate her at any sum.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. One more question—and the gentleman from Indiana knows that I am sincere in my questions——

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is there anything in the existing law or the proposed law preventing the widow of a soldier, who is a second time a widow, although she may be independent, although she may be rich upon the death of her second husband, is there anything here to prevent her from receiving a pension under this bill or in the existing law, as much so as a widow who is absolutely penniless?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Simply the provision of the general law, unless I find the provision in the present bill. This law provides as a cure for that provision that if the widow remarries she shall be dropped from the pension roll. The act of 1901 provides that if she again becomes a widow by the death of her husband, or if she is divorced without any fault on her part, she may be placed on the pension roll as she was before. That is the general law. It simply replaces her as she was before.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Under existing law, suppose the widow of a soldier is absolutely independent, is she pensionable?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. If her husband died of disease or wounds which occurred in the service, from injuries received in the service, she would be pensionable at the rate of $12 a month if he was a private, $14 if he was a lieutenant, and $17 if a captain, etc.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Suppose she married a millionaire?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. If her husband died of disease incurred or injury received in the line of service, she would be pensionable.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If he died and left her a millionaire, she is pensionable?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Yes; and so is any widow if her husband died of disease incurred or injury received.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And this law continues that law?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Provided she becomes a widow and was his wife during the time of his service, yes, sir; and should do it.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LACEY. Does this proposed amendment cover this case: Where a widow otherwise eligible has never been put on the pension roll by reason of failure to furnish the testimony, and after remarriage her second husband died, can she now be restored or placed on the pension roll, where she never was?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Not under the act of March 3, 1901, but this bill is for that purpose.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That legislation is now complete.

Mr. LACEY. Well, now, as to the minor and helpless child who has never been placed on the roll—does the bill cover that class?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. No.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the fact that when the Chair asked him if there was any amendment to the bill the gentleman said no. The Chair finds on page 3, section 2, line 14, a committee amendment, and the Chair thinks that possibly the gentleman overlooked it.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the Chair is right; I did overlook it for the moment.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, this will be included in the gentleman's motion.

There was no objection.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LOUD. At the top of page 2 you have provided that any widow who was the lawful wife of any officer or enlisted man or "other person" in the Army. Why do you put in the words "other person?"

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Let me read a little from the report:

Upon the adjudication of claims arising under this law of March 3, 1901, it was found that the words "of any officer or enlisted man in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States" excluded from the benefits of that act a very worthy class of widows, namely, the widows of those mentioned in paragraphs 2 and 3 of section 4693, Revised Statutes, which paragraphs read as follows:

"SEC. 4693. The persons entitled as beneficiaries under section 4692 are as follows:

* * * * * * *

"Second. Any master serving on a gunboat, or any pilot, engineer, sailor, or other person not regularly mustered, serving upon any gunboat or war vessel of the United States, disabled by any wound or injury received, or otherwise incapacitated, while in the line of duty, for procuring his subsistence by manual labor.

"Third. Any person not an enlisted soldier in the Army, serving for the time being as a member of the militia of any State, under orders of an officer of the United States, or who volunteered for the time being to serve with any regularly organized military or naval force of the United States, or who otherwise volunteered and rendered service in any engagement with rebels or Indians, disabled in consequence of wounds or injury received in the line of duty in such temporary service. But no claim of a State militiaman, or nonenlisted person, on account of disability from wounds or injury received in battle with rebels or Indians, while temporarily rendering service, shall be valid unless prosecuted to a successful issue prior to the 4th day of July, 1874."

The result of the omission, therefore, was that the widow of a State militiaman, nonenlisted person, master of a gunboat, or pilot, etc., who was the wife of such person during the war of the rebellion and who died of wounds or injuries received while serving with any regularly organized military or naval force of the United States, and who was pensioned up to the date of her remarriage, had no title to restoration to the roll under the act of March 3, 1901, for the reason that the act as passed included only the widows of officers and men of the military or naval establishment of the United States, as mentioned in paragraph 1 of section 4693.

To rectify this omission the bill proposes to amend said act of March 3, 1901, by inserting on page 4 of said bill, in line 13, the words "or other person," and on page 2, in line 1, the words "as described in," and by inserting on same page, lines 2 and 3, the words "paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes of the United States."

Another class of widows was deprived from the benefits of the act of March 3, 1901, namely, those who remarried and had never been on the pension roll by reason of the provisions of the act of March 3, 1865.

The organic act of July 14, 1862, gives to the widow of a soldier a clear title to pension from the date of the death of her husband to the date of her remarriage, but the act of March 3, 1865, provided that in the case of the remarriage of a widow without any payment of pension to her to which she might have been entitled, pension for the minor child or children shall begin from the date of the death of the soldier.

This act of March 3, 1865, applied no matter whether the widow had or had not a claim pending at the time of her remarriage.

In order to provide for this class of widows, a new section has been added to the act of March 3, 1901, as provided for on page 3, from lines 9 to 15, which reads as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the provisions of this act shall be extended to those widows otherwise entitled whose husbands died of disease contracted during the period of their military and naval service, but who were deprived of pension under the act of March 3, 1865, because of their failure to draw any pension by reason of their remarriage."

Relief will thus be afforded after adding the words "wounds, injuries, or" after the word "of," on page 3, in line 10, to these widows, and they will be placed upon the same basis as other widows under the act of July 4, 1862; the act of March 31, 1865, which deprived them of pension, having been repealed by the act of July 27, 1868.

Notwithstanding this repeal of the act of March 3, 1865, these widows can not now apply for pension from the date of death of their husbands to the date of their remarriage, for the reason that a pensionable period does not exist, pension having been paid to the minor child or children from the soldier's death.

Up to June 30, 1901, but 3,258 applications had beed filed under the act of March 3, 1901, and of this number quite a large percentage was rejected owing to the omissions in said act which this bill proposes to correct.

The bill is reported back with the recommendation that it pass after the same shall have been amended as follows:

On page 3, in line 10, after the word "of," insert the words "wounds, injuries, or."

Now, under the act of March 3, 1901, the widow of any person serving on a gunboat as pilot, engineer, etc., was not included in that language, so the Commissioner of Pensions held. The purpose here is to include that class of widows on the same footing, because of the fact that their husbands received their injuries or died by reason of wounds in the line of service. We thought such a widow just as meritorious as other widows who had been included. Such widows are recognized under other sections of the law, and we thought that the war widow—the wife of the soldier while he was in the service—ought to be included as well as the others. That is the purpose of this bill.

Mr. LOUD. Does the gentleman contend that this bill applies only to the widows of those killed in the service?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Unless they were mustered. There is a class of widows under the general law who have not remarried receiving pensions, although their husbands were not actually mustered, by reason of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes, as set out in the report, who are entitled to and do draw pensions. This bill will apply to them, and the original act of March 3, 1901, meant to include them. But when we come to apply that law we find by the language used in the act of 1901 she is excluded, and we seek to put her on the same footing with the other widows who were wives at the time the service of the soldier was rendered.

Mr. LOUD. I will ask my question again, as the gentleman did not understand it. He assumes that this act applies only to the widows of those killed in battle.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I do not assume that; but under the present law, where there was no actual muster, it made no difference whether the husband was killed in the line of battle or while in action on a gunboat or in service as a pilot, engineer, etc., the widow draws a pension. We are now seeking to amend the existing law so that if the husband was in the line of service, although not actually mustered in, and was killed, the widow shall be placed upon the same footing as all other widows under the general law, and shall be restored to the pension roll. That is all that this bill does.

Mr. LOUD. If I understand the gentleman's answer, then, in order to take in a few the committee has brought in a bill here broad enough to take in everybody.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. The law of March 3, 1901, undertook to take in all the widows who had been wives during the service of their husbands.

Mr. LOUD. Widows of officers and enlisted men.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Yes. But when the Commissioner came to apply the act of March 3, 1901, he holds that she is not included. Section 4693 we thought ought to apply to such as again become widows, in view of the fact that that section gives such widows before they are remarried a pensionable standing, and they being excluded unless this amendment be made, the law now excludes a widow who had been the wife during the service of her husband, although that husband was killed in battle. Under the existing law such a widow is not entitled to be placed back on the pension roll. We have undertaken to place back on the pension roll all women who were the wives of soldiers during their service.

Mr. LOUD. Not only soldiers, but teamsters, carpenters, etc.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. No, sir.

Mr. LOUD. I am willing to contest that point with the gentleman.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Section 4693 does not put the widows of teamsters on the pension roll. It does not place anyone on the pension roll except those mentioned in the section, and that section is quoted in the report, and the committee desires that the war wives shall be entitled to the benefits of section 4693.

Mr. LOUD. But the language is qualified in the report, and it is not qualified in the bill. It is the bill that is to become a law, not the report.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. We do make the qualification in the bill.

Mr. LOUD. Where is it? I would like to find it. I would like the gentleman to explain to the House who may be included by the language "any other person?"

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I ask the gentleman to read section 4708, as recited in the bill.

The remarriage of any widow, dependent mother, or dependent sister entitled to pension shall not bar her right to such pension to the date of her remarriage, whether an application therefor was filed before or after such marriage; but on the remarriage of any widow, dependent mother, or dependent sister having a pension such pension shall cease.

That is the law.

Mr. LOUD. Now read the proviso.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana (reading):

Provided, however, That any widow who was the lawful wife of any officer or enlisted man or other person in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States, as described in paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, during the period of his service in any war, and whose name was placed or shall hereafter be placed on the pension roll because of her husband's death as the result of wound or injury received or disease contracted in such military or naval service and whose name has been or shall hereafter be dropped from said pension roll by reason of her marriage to another person who has since died or shall hereafter die, or from whom she has been heretofore or shall be hereafter divorced, upon her own application and without fault on her part, and if she is without means of support—

That answers the question of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], which I was not able to answer at the moment—other than her daily labor, as defined by the acts of June 27, 1890, and May 9, 1900.

So that this bill applies only to such as are dependent as defined by law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where is that? From what part of the bill is the gentleman reading?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Page 2, line 14, and the following lines: 16, 17, and 18.

May 9, 1900, shall be entitled to have her name again placed on the pension roll at the rate now provided for widows by the acts of July 14, 1862, March 3, 1873, and March 19, 1886.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is the number of the bill the gentleman is reading?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. No. 12141; the bill now being considered.

Mr. LOUD. Let me ask the gentleman to refer back to line 7, and define what the words "shall hereafter" mean where they occur in the line as "shall hereafter be placed on the pension roll?"

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Now, to illustrate: A widow who remarried before she was placed on the pension roll is entitled to a pension during the period of her widowhood, if she was a war widow, and is placed on the pension roll during the period that she was entitled to, whether that was six months or six years. If she is now placed on the roll under that section, she will be entitled to her pension by reason of the fact that she was a widow during the service, if this bill passes.

Mr. LOUD. Well, I thought I understood the section.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. In other words, as I said a moment ago, we intend to make it broad enough to put all the women who were wives during the service on the same plain as if they had not remarried, provided they are widows and dependent. Any other wife, the wife of a soldier who was not a wife during the war, if she remarries is out, but if she was the wife during the service and then remarries she is entitled to go back on the roll by reason of the terms of this bill. This bill has nothing covered in it, and but the one purpose, and, I submit, is most meritorious.

Mr. LOUD. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is very hard to understand a bill of this kind or a bill of any kind from a casual reading from the desk. Hence I have questioned the gentleman who has charge of this bill as closely as I could in order that I might understand what he understands this bill to mean. I can not place any other construction upon this bill, after hearing the gentleman explain it, line by line almost, than that this proviso here, as explained by him, in line 7, refers to any widow hereafter placed on the pension roll who is the widow of any other person, and I do not believe there is a person in the world who can take that section and place any other construction than that upon it.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. RAY of New York. The gentleman is under a misapprehension.

Mr. LOUD. I hope so.

Mr. RAY of New York. If he will listen to me, I think I can make this matter to plain to him. Under the pension law as it stands the widows of the enlisted officers and men of the Navy and privates of the Army may draw a pension under certain conditions, provided the husband was killed in the service or died of disease or disability contracted in the service. If they remarry they lose their pension or right to a pension, as the case may be. In addition to that the general law included and includes another class of widows, to wit, the widows of masters of gunboats, pilots, engineers, or sailors or other persons not regularly mustered—now mind, not mustered—serving upon any gunboat and disabled by wound or injury received or otherwise incapacitated while in the line of duty.

Now, the words "other persons" refer explicitly to those who were in the service, who were as a rule entitled to be but had not been regularly mustered, and they were incapacitated in the line of duty while acting as a soldier, doing the duty of a soldier, or a similar duty as mentioned. Now, when the Committee on Invalid Pensions in 1900, I think it was, reported their bill for the restoration to the pension roll of the widows who had remarried, they did include by the language of the bill the widows of those regularly enlisted and mustered, but by an inadvertence they left out certain remarried widows, those who were entitled to pensions by reason of being the widow of a man not regularly mustered but who was disabled or wounded while in the actual service of his country, viz, widows of masters of gunboats, pilots, engineers, etc., as described by me, and the reason for writing that in the law originally was that a great many soldiers and sailors went into the service and performed duties, but it so happened that they were not at a place where they could be mustered. Some of them were killed, some of them were wounded before they were mustered into the service, and it included another class of people, namely, the widows of masters, pilots, engineers, etc.; and an illustration of one class we had up at Gettysburg—I believe it not to be merely traditional—the case of a man like John Burns——

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid my time is about run out.

Mr. RAY of New York. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Suppose the man shouldered his musket and went into battle, and suppose he was shot down while fighting for his country. His widow would be included under the general law. So if injured and he died as the result of his wounds——

Mr. LOUD. I do not care anything about that. The worthy cases ought to be taken in, but everybody should not be taken in.

Mr. RAY of New York. This bill will not take in everybody.

Mr. LOUD. I think it will.

Mr. RAY of New York. It will only take in the widows of those men who were wounded or disabled while actually fighting for their country or who received disabilities in service, and they are included because there were cases where they did the duty of a soldier before they were mustered in or were in discharge of duties not requiring a muster. I appeal to the gentleman from Indiana if I have not stated the case correctly.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Yes. Now, if the gentleman from California will allow me——

Mr. LOUD. I have only two or three minutes remaining.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. This has been administered by the Commissioner of Pensions for two years. Neither he nor anyone else claims that it will take in everybody, but he simply claims that it excludes those who might be drawing pensions under the other section.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman show me the present law that uses the words "any other person?" If he had shown me that a long time ago I would not have raised any objection. But no; the gentleman refers to the law which says:

Any master serving on a gunboat, or any pilot, engineer, sailor, or other person not regularly mustered—

That enumerates them.

Mr. RAY of New York. Read right on—or any other person not regularly mustered, serving upon any gunboat or war vessel of the United States, disabled by any wound or injury received, or otherwise.

Mr. LOUD. That is your present law, yes; and you propose to go beyond that.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. No; that does not apply to the widow of such a man, and we simply make it apply to her. If the law is to apply to any person who was not mustered, if the husband died in the line of service, what is the use of mentioning gunboats, pilots, or engineers, and so forth? Why not simply say the widow of any person who died in the line of service, and so forth?

Mr. LOUD. One of the first questions I asked the gentleman was if this applied to any other class of persons than those whose husbands died in the service, and the gentleman said "yes."

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I said "no."

Mr. LOUD. That is where the gentleman misled me. He said "yes."

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I said "no."

Mr. LOUD. I hope the gentleman will look at his remarks, because I was paying close attention, and that is the way I understood him.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I beg the gentleman's pardon; and if I said "yes," then I beg leave to revise my remarks.

Mr. LOUD. Because I am very free to say that I do not care how a person was killed, whether he was regularly mustered or not. Hence that was one of the first questions I asked, and the gentleman went on to say "yes."

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I am very sorry if I misled the gentleman.

Mr. RAY of New York. Did you use the words "killed in the service?"

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. RAY of New York. That would be incorrect.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LOUD. Or who died as the result of it.

Mr. RAY of New York. Either killed in the service or who lost his life because of disabilities contracted in the service, either disease or wounds.

Mr. LOUD. I did not ask the gentleman the whole question, but he understood the question evidently.

Mr. RAY of New York. I do not think he understood your meaning.

Mr. LOUD. If that was the intent of the law, that is what I wanted to find out. I will say that I have no objection to pensioning anybody who lost his life as the result of the service, whether regularly mustered in or not.

Mr. RAY of New York. I will pledge the gentleman my honor as a gentleman and a lawyer that this bill will not go further than the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MIERS] has stated, and as I, too, have stated it. It is designed to restore those entitled but for a remarriage and limits the restoration to those whose income does not exceed $250 per year, as I read and understand it. It goes no further.

Mr. LOUD. Well, I hope not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana has stated, and the distinguished jurist and member from the State of New York [Mr. RAY] has just stated, that this bill could not possibly "go any further than it already goes." That is too true, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman from Indiana has stated that it takes in all the widows, whether they are millionaires or paupers.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Oh, no.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is the language of the gentleman. I will go by the Official Reporter's notes of the statement, and I think they will bear me out.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I said so far as I was concerned I would be willing that it should go that far, but this bill does not.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is what the gentleman said—that he would be willing.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman, then, would be willing to pension the widow of a soldier of the Army of the United States, even though she herself was a millionaire.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I would to the same extent that her husband if he had lived would be entitled to a pension. If a soldier received an injury, he is given a pension. Now, if his widow fought at the other end of the line, and took care of the family, and waited for the returns from the battle field, I would place her on the same footing, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then, I am not surprised that the pension question is one that agitates the public mind of this whole country. Nobody objects—I am sure I do not, nor is there a man in this Honse or out of it who objects—to a dependent soldier or a dependent widow of an honorably discharged soldier drawing a pension—not one.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; I have not time to yield further. Here, Mr. Speaker, is the distinguished gentleman from Indiana saying that he is willing to increase the pension roll, notwithstanding the fact that there are thousands and thousands of persons who are justly entitled to pensions who are not pensioned at all. Why one man has been kicked out of the Pension Office because he tried to keep the pension list down and make it a roll of honor and keep it to just limits, and sent clear out of the country, and yet here is the distinguished gentleman from Indiana standing upon the Democratic side of the House saying that he is willing to agree to pension a widow who in her own right and title is a millionaire. At the same time we have widows above the Ohio and below it who have no pension at all, and who are knocking Friday after Friday and day after day and year after year to get their pensions given to them by Congress or to get an inadequate pension raised up to the standard it should be raised.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; I decline to yield. I have not time. Now then, Mr. Speaker, I appeared before this same committee from which this bill comes a few days ago, pursuant to a voluntary arrangement made with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL], when we were to take up the question of increasing the limit, which is inadequate, of the Mexican pension law, but I got no hearing. The distinguished gentleman from Indiana said over two years ago, upon the floor of this House, that he was in favor of increasing the rates allowed to the old Mexican soldier. Yet the distinguished gentleman knows that only those who have been stricken from the roll have been restored, and the law stands unchanged by this Congress.

The Senate bill was sent here by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], and it sleeps in the committee of which the distinguished son of Indiana is an honored member. Nothing has been done with that, nothing has been done with the bill I introduced along the same line, and I was not given even a chance to be heard.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me to be heard there?

Mr. NORTON. That is not in our committee.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. That is before the Committee on Pensions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana will wait until consent is given for him to interrupt the gentleman speaking.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Your bill is pending before the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is "pending." It is sleeping in its pendency. It is sound asleep, and I am trying to get my Democratic friends——

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman should distinguish between the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions. His bill is before another committee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where is it sleeping?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. LOUDENSLAGER is chairman of the Committee on Pensions. Why are you abusing my committee?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If you are not guilty, I will take it all back. I am beating along the bushes pretty close. I went before the latter committee, and they were too busy pensioning other widows to pay attention to those who were penniless. I was denied a hearing for the poor penniless old Mexican soldier, tottering about the brink of the grave, possibly a pauper's grave, and yet they were and they are denied a hearing. The old Mexican soldier is denied a hearing in this great Congress, and yet the distinguished gentleman would pass a law pensioning millionaires. My friend, I believe, now corrects the statement and says that this bill does not so provide. If it did I should vote against it. But, Mr. Speaker, I say that it is time for Congress to call a halt upon the pensioning of those who are not disabled and dependent. Among our earliest pension laws provision was made not to pension those who simply were wounded, but those who were incapable of making a living, and now it has got to be that simply because a woman is a widow of a soldier of a war forty years ago, regardless of her temporal affairs, she is pensioned, and I take it the same thing would apply to the soldier himself.

Now, the law which my friend from Indiana and my friend from New York and other members of the House by their silence on this occasion advocate here is to provide a pension for those who, although being disabled or wounded, are absolutely able to live without it, while for those who were not only wounded and disabled by their wounds, but in old age are practically upon the paupers' list, nothing or insufficient amounts are provided.

In the name of economy, in the name of justice, in the name of the soldier himself, who would have the pension roll a roll of honor instead of being, as it is, one of suspicion, who would have economy administered and absolute justice, I do say that I do not believe from what has been said and what has been done that absolute justice is meted out to those who are pensioned nor to those who are denied an adequate pension of the Mexican soldiers.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill with the amendments.

The question was taken, and (in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

PENSIONS OF MAIMED EX-SOLDIERS.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I call up the bill (S. 4850) to increase the pensions of those who have lost limbs in the military or naval service of the United States, or are totally disabled in the same, and ask that the rules be suspended, the amendments proposed by the committee be adopted, and the bill passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire, by direction of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, calls up the bill S. 4850, and moves that the rules be suspended, the adoption of the amendments reported by the committee, and the passage of the bill as recommended. The Chair will here state that it is not the duty of the Chair to ask if a second is demanded. It is the privilege of any member to demand a second.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act all persons on the pension roll, and all persons hereafter granted a pension, who, while in the military or naval service of the United States and in the line of duty, from wounds, injuries, or disease originating prior to August 4, 1886, shall have lost one hand or one foot, or been totally disabled in the same, shall receive a pension at the rate of $40 per month; that all persons who, in like manner, shall have lost an arm at or above the elbow or a leg at or above the knee, or been totally disabled in the same, shall receive a pension at the rate of $46 per month; that all persons who, in like manner, shall have lost an arm at the shoulder joint or a leg at the hip joint, or so near the shoulder or hip joint or where the same is in such a condition as to prevent the use of an artificial limb, shall receive a pension at the rate of $55 per month, and that all persons who, in like manner, shall have lost one hand and one foot, or been totally disabled in the same, shall receive a pension at the rate of $60 per month; and that all persons who, in like manner, shall have lost both feet shall receive a pension at the rate of $100 per month: Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to reduce any pension under any act, public or private.

SEC. 2. That the pensions of all persons who served one year or more in the Army or Navy of the United States, and who, under the act approved June 27, 1890, and the acts amendatory thereof, are drawing or hereafter shall be entitled to draw a pension at the rate of $12 per month, and who are or shall become so disabled from injuries or disease as to require the frequent and periodical aid and attendance of another person, shall be increased to $30 per month from and after the date of the certificate of the examining surgeon or board of examining surgeons showing such degree of disability and made subsequent to the passage of this act.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, this is what is known as the maimed soldiers' bill, with amendments proposed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions. There are four classes of pensioners the pensions of which it is proposed to increase. First, there is a provision to increase the pension of those who have lost one hand or one foot, or been totally disabled in the same, from $30 to $45 a month, or an increase of $180 a year. That was the Senate proposition. That would take an appropriation of $605,000, in round numbers. There are 3,363 of that class of pensioners. Your committee thought, while dealing fairly with that class, that an increase of $10 a month instead of $15 a month, which would increase the pension from $360 to $480 a year, would be about as near a level as we could carry it when compared with other pensioners. That would be $403,000, or $200,000 less than the Senate provided for.

The next is where the pensioner has lost an arm at or above the elbow, or a leg at or above the knee, or has been totally disabled in the same. The Senate bill provided an increase from $30 to $60 per month. There are 2,357 of that class on the roll. The Senate proposition would require an appropriation of $395,000. We thought an increase of $10 a month, or $120 a year, to that class of pensioners, making their pension $552 a year, would be as far as we ought to go, and the Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended an amendment to that effect.

The third proposition is to take those who have lost an arm at the shoulder joint, or a leg at the hip joint, or so near the shoulder or hip joint as to prevent the use of an artificial limb. The Senate proposition provided an increase of $180 a year. There are 1,724 of these pensioners on the roll, which would require an appropriation of $310,320. In that class we thought an addition of $10 a month, increasing the pension from $540 to $660, was as far as we were warranted in going, and we recommend an amendment of that character. That makes a reduction of something over $104,000 in annual appropriations on that class.

The fourth provision is to increase the pension of those who lost one hand and one foot or have been totally disabled in the same. There are only 17 of these now on the rolls, and the appropriation is very small. The difference in amount in what is asked for by the Senate bill and what is recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions is $416,530 in favor of the Government and against the pensioners.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman means between the Senate bill and what is proposed by the amendments by the gentleman's committee?

Mr. SULLOWAY. Yes.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman means down to section 2.

Mr. SULLOWAY. The aggregate of appropriation in the Senate bill would be $1,314,696.

Mr. LOUD. Per annum?

Mr. SULLOWAY. Yes; that would be the increase under the Senate provision. Ours is an increase of $898,176, making a difference of $416,520.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman, in making the estimate of the decrease, does not include section 2?

Mr. SULLOWAY. No; I am coming to that. There is one little feature of this bill that I did not mention. They who have lost both hands now receive $100 per month. There are seven or eight left who have lost both feet. Those are receiving $72 per month; and while the proposition was to increase all classes of the maimed soldiers, your committee thought and recommend that the pension for those who have lost both feet should be increased from $72 to $100 a month. That was a proposition not contained in the Senate bill.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to ask a question in regard to section 2.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I am coming to that.

Mr. LOUD. If it will not disturb the gentleman too much, I would like to ask the question now. I see that a man under the act of 1890 draws $12 a month, and if he is subsequently disabled, becomes permanently helpless, so that he requires the periodical attendance of some person, is entitled to $30 a month.

Mr. SULLOWAY. He might under certain conditions, but not quite so broadly as you state it.

Mr. LOUD. If disabled under the general law, so as to draw $12 a month, and subsequently, by disease contracted in the Army or by old age or otherwise, he requires nursing part of the time, he is not entitled to $30 a month. In other words, a man under the act of 1890 gets a better pension under certain circumstances than the veteran would get under the old law.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I do not agree to that by any manner of means.

Mr. LACEY. I am asking whether that would not be the effect?

Mr. SULLOWAY. I do not admit that it would be.

Now, I want to say that 25 per cent of all the bills reported by our committee during this Congress for those who were soldiers have been bills increasing to $24, $30, or more pensions of men who were blind or paralytics or total wrecks. I want to say that during the Fifty-sixth Congress and the Fifty-seventh, up to this day, there has never been a voice lifted in this Hall against a single one of those claims.

This section to which the gentleman from Iowa calls attention is not exactly the act of 1890. That required only ninety days' service. This section requires service of a year and requires also an adjudication by the Pension Bureau that the soldier is a total wreck. In these cases the soldier is receiving $12 a month; he is blind or disabled or in some way a total wreck. He comes here, or somebody for him, asking for a special act, and you grant it in every instance.

In my judgment the estimate here is an excessive one. I do not believe you can to-day look over your districts, gentlemen, and find in each district two men in the condition I have stated—blind and total wrecks—for whom you have not introduced bills and who have not been provided for by special acts. Yet this estimate is based upon the theory that there are 10 such men in each of your 300 districts. Adopting that estimate as correct for 300 districts, and taking into consideration our reduction upon the Senate proposition and taking into consideration also the fact that the pension asked is $30 a month, we would by this proposed amendment add only $231,000 to the bill as it came from the Senate.

I believe section 2 to be very meritorious. I believe it will relieve Congress of these special acts to a very large extent. The bill last up will relieve us of applications that have been coming to us in behalf of women who were the wives of soldiers during the war and who have since remarried and thereby lost their pensions. We shall no longer have to deal with cases of that kind. Now, if this section should become a law, we shall have relieved the class to which I have referred. I believe it is our patriotic duty to adopt this legislation. I believe this appropriation ought to be granted. I hope and trust there will not be a voice or vote on this floor against it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY] reserve the balance of his time?

Mr. SULLOWAY. Yes sir. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with my remarks, I will ask the gentleman from New Hampshire one question: Who gave him the estimate of the cost of section 2? I would like to know where that estimate came from.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I stated that we went on the assumption that there are 10 disabled old soldiers in each of the 300 Congressional districts.

Mr. LOUD. The Pension Department has made no estimate of that kind?

Mr. SULLOWAY. No sir.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives, I might say, is "up against it." Section 2 of this act is proposed to be enacted into law for the benefit of all men who served one year in the Army; and presumably it takes the place of the individual or personal measures which are brought up here on every other Friday. The gentleman from New Hampshire says that the House has passed time and again, without the protest of a single individual, cases of this character. That may be true as to all except myself; yet the gentleman knows that I have constantly protested and that I protest to-day.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I am very ready to admit that fact.

Mr. LOUD. I have stated, too, and the gentleman has heard me, that I do not believe any man has a claim upon the Government simply from the fact that he may have been a soldier. The denial of any such principle is with me fundamental. If a man has received an injury in the service of his country, then, as I have said many times before, I believe the whole country should be taxed to make reparation as far as possible for what he has suffered in defense of his country. The Senate bill, I will say, meets no objection at my hands. If a man has lost an arm or a leg or both arms or both legs, there is not money enough in the world to replace what has been taken away from him. But when you enter the field of pensioning at the rate of $30 a month every man who was in the service for one year, it is something that we do not owe and something that the good soldiers of this country do not ask.

The gentleman says this will cost about $230,000 a year. Sir, I make this assertion, that every man who was in the service for one year will be entitled to a pension of $30 a month for some period before he shall die.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Why not every soldier now at $12 a month? The gentleman says every one of them will be pensioners at $30 a month. If that is possible, why not every one of them pensioners at $12 a month? That is the limit now.

Mr. LOUD. I do not know that I fully understand the gentleman.

Mr. SULLOWAY. The proposition of the gentleman is that every soldier at some time will reach the maximum of the amount of pension allowed.

Mr. LOUD. Thirty dollars.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Why not every soldier to-day at the maximum receiving $12 a month, if that is a fact? Is human nature going to change?

Mr. LOUD. Because they have not reached that period yet. They are getting there fast enough, if the gentleman will only wait. As a matter of fact, in the Pension Office, with those who ask for a pension, who are of a certain age, it is assumed that senility exists, and the man is pensioned, and substantially it is not erroneous. In fact, when a man has reached the age of 65 or 70 years the presumption is that he is entitled to $12 a month, and it is right, too, because he has passed that period when he is able to work. The gentleman of course has endeavored to put a stopper on here by the use of the words "frequent" and "periodical." Well, how long "frequent" is or how long "periodical" is I do not know. Some of them are quite long.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOUD. I yield to the gentleman, certainly.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Those words are as old as pension legislation.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, I know that.

Mr. SULLOWAY. They are well understood.

Mr. LOUD. But they only have a construction in the minds of a jury, and they oftentimes differ about it. I have great sympathy for the gentlemen who are agonizing for the old soldier. If the old soldier did not have any votes, I am afraid we would not agonize for them quite so much. I can not tell how much this act will cost, but it may cost $20,000,000 a year.

Mr. BURLESON. It probably will.

Mr. LOUD. Now, I will say again, that any man who requires the attention of anybody, it may be once a month, it may be once in six months, or once in a year, under the terms of this law, will be entitled to a pension of $30 a month. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY] makes a note as though that were not true.

That is the way I construe the language "frequent and periodical." If the House wants to pass the legislation, that is for it to determine. It is a hard question on the eve of a campaign, too, because there is not any one of us who wants to lose the soldier vote, and it is unfortunate, to say the least, that the committee has, just preceding the election, brought in a bill which embarrasses, to say the least, some members of Congress. It does not embarrass me any; not a particle. I shall vote against it. I should have voted against the act of 1890, because it was wrong in principle, enunciating my principles as I have here, and as are well known, which I think is a well-grounded principle.

I say, where a man has lost anything in defense of his country, his country should reimburse him, but where a man has served in the Army—we will say, in the year 1847—and in 1902, by reason of age, by reason of natural infirmities, requires a little attention once in a while, then I say it is nonsense that the Government can seek to reimburse him for his one year's service by paying him $30 a month.

Of course that may be perhaps an extreme illustration, but what the theory is that prompts legislation of this kind I can not see, because it replaces nothing. It does not seek to replace anything, because a man's living forty years after the war is prima facie evidence that he has lost nothing in defense of the flag. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. From whom does the gentleman get his time?

Mr. NORTON. From the chairman of the committee.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULLOWAY. I can not yield much, but I would ask that everyone have leave to print on this measure for ten days.

The SPEAKER. There is no such order of the House to that effect.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the gentleman from California. I was considerably surprised, and yet not so much so either, for on all occasions when he undertakes to disturb the serenity of this House or create suspicion he accuses his fellow-members of being afraid of the vote of their constituents. There is something behind this measure, and there is something in the patriotism of the American people that does not care for such threats as those offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD]. This bill is just, is honest, and ought to be passed. The maimed soldier is the man who has suffered every hour of his life from the very moment of his wound.

I say here and now that the physicians and surgeons of the country will bear me out in the statement that any man who has lost an arm or leg enjoys no peace and sees no hour of rest. This bill is not to take $20,000,000 out of the Treasury; the statement is untrue. The estimates are fair and honest and honorable, and to insinuate that members upon this floor are voting for this measure to secure votes is an insinuation against the patriotism, the honesty, and the purposes of American citizens. [Applause.] I hurl back the insinuation, and I state to the gentleman, soldier as he was, that he must have been heartless upon the field, as he is heartless upon the floor, to charge that the soldier comes here begging you for favors. He comes here demanding only what is right, and this committee have been honest and fearless in their efforts to do the right thing. This bill will relieve Congress; yes, and it will not only relieve them, but it will relieve the old soldier who has been waiting month after month and year after year and going to his grave without a settlement of his case and waiting for the action of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I wish I had time to exploit the provisions of this bill. I look upon it as just and honest. A moment ago the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], who has been recuperating his energies in the South, who has come back here to speak upon a measure of which he knows nothing, betrayed his ignorance by charging the Committee on Invalid Pensions with smothering bills. He said, too, that another measure which was reported by this same committee provided for the pensioning of millionaires. That is not so. It provided for the pensioning of widows having incomes of only $250 a year. I trust that no other man upon this floor will dare to open his mouth against this measure or to utter an insinuation that a member of Congress upon this floor has fallen so low as to vote away the public money for the benefit of undeserving men in order to secure votes. [Applause.]

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I presume that if this bill covered no other cases except those of men who have lost arms or legs or feet or hands, then there would not have been a single voice raised in opposition to it. I understood the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] to say that he would support any measure within reasonable bounds to compensate the man who had lost his leg or his arm.

Mr. LOUD. That is right.

Mr. GROSVENOR. My colleague from Ohio [Mr. NORTON] has well said what we all know, that these men not only suffer every hour of their lives, but that that suffering grows in intensity as age creeps on. If you take off from the human frame an arm, however well it may have healed up, the agony is there, the memory is there, the suffering is there, and as age comes on I think the increase here provided is small enongh.

But the gentleman opposes another proposition, and wishes to know what there is behind it that justifies the increase up to $30 a month for men now drawing a maximum of $12 under the law of 1890. The provision of the bill is well drawn. It is not subject to the criticisms that my friend from California [Mr. LOUD] has made. It provides only for "frequent and periodical conditions" that require an attendant. To take a soldier who fought for his country, and dress him and undress him and feed him and move him about, does not need any interpretation, it seems to me. If the disability had been incurred in line of duty, he would be entitled under the law, as it exists to-day, to $72 a month; although I agree with the gentleman that there is a difference in the phraseology of the law, and it doubtless will have a different interpretation at the hands of the administering power of the Government.

Mr. SULLOWAY. There are 107,000 of these cases.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am told by the chairman of the committee that there are 107,000 of these men.

Mr. SULLOWAY. That were pensioned under the act of 1890.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Drawing now only $12 a month. Now the gentleman wants to know what is back of this. I will put it in a very few words, for I have not the eloquence, when it comes to talking about soldiers, that some gentlemen have, but I will tell you what I think is the underlying proposition. If any man with an honorable discharge, who bore the flag of his country to victory and brought it home in honor, is in such a condition that because of any event in his life he may become a charge upon charity or an inmate of the poorhouse, I believe the American people will justify an appropriation of money out of the public Treasury to insure that man, in all these periodical attacks of whatever the disease may be, that he shall not be consigned to poverty and starvation. [Applause.]

I believe that there is patriotism enough on both sides of the House to say that they resent it as a stigma and disgrace that a man who bore arms on either side of the great conflict, or any man who has been honorably discharged, shall go to the poor house. Thank God the States of this Union have done their duty on this subject, and now comes the committee with an intelligent report to the House of Representatives, and they have asked the House of Representatives to respond to the great heart, soul, and patriotism of the American people. I do not believe there will be any votes against this bill. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire has two minutes remaining.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Question.

Mr. LOUD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, my objection to this bill chiefly lies to section 2—the one that increases pensions from $12 a month under the act of 1890 to $30 a month simply upon the certificate of the board of surgeons that the pensioner requires frequent and periodical attendance of another person. I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill, or some one else who can answer, whether this refers to the local board or the board of surgeons here in the Department?

Mr. CALDERHEAD. I think if the gentleman will read the bill he will find that it can only refer to the local board.

Mr. SIMS. I so understood it. Now, I want to say this: It has often come under my observation when persons apply for a pension or an increase and were ordered for examination before a local board it has said, "You are entitled to $24, $30, or $36 a month," and when this pension application comes before the Pension Bureau they give a pension of $8, $10, and $12, and then the applicant claims he has not been given what the local board recommended and wants increase by private act.

The local boards in my country are very sympathetic, and make the most liberal statements in reference to the trouble, disease, wound, or whatever the disabilities of applicants are. I want to say, so far as my own country is concerned, I think it would be a very easy matter to convince these local boards that it takes frequent and periodical attendance when it tends to increase the pension from $12 to $30 a month. I think this section ought to go out of the bill or the bill ought to be defeated. Having heard the two distinguished gentlemen from Ohio, General GROSVENOR and Mr. NORTON, upon this bill, I remember to have heard them here on one memorable occasion, when the eloquence of their words were unsurpassed, when they were describing the utter helplessness of the distinguished soldier, Gen. Americus V. Rice, when they represented that his condition was so terrible that he was always suffering. They stated a condition of suffering of the general that almost brought tears to the eyes of the members of this House, and as a result of their eloquence a bill was passed giving him a pension of $100 a month.

It came to my knowledge a few days afterwards that this distinguished soldier was drawing a salary exceeding $2,000 a year at that very time as an employee in the Census Office. It was represented that his condition was such that he was absolutely unable to do anything, and would need constant personal attention. A few weeks ago I had occasion to go to the Census Bureau for some purpose, and was pleased to see General Rice there discharging his duties; not dead, and I was glad of it. Because, from the pathetic statements made by the two gentlemen from Ohio more than a year ago, I did not think that distinguished soldier could live so long. I was glad to see him still able to discharge his duties. I have no objection to his being employed.

I think that preference should be given to those who have served in the Army. But we ought to have the facts presented to us when we consider a bill. Here we found that this man was represented as being in such a condition that he was utterly helpless, and it did seem to me a little strange to see him discharging the important duties of an important position more than a year later. Now, I want to say that when we consider these appeals from members of Congress, and act upon them in such a way, with the neighborly feeling and comradeship that will exist with local boards, it will be a very easy matter to say that every one of these men who are now drawing $12 a month will need periodical and frequent personal attention of another person. I think this section ought to go out of the bill or the bill be defeated. I hope the gentleman will consent to an amendment striking out this section.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules, agreeing to the amendments, and passing the bill as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. SIMS. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 95, noes 18.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill as amended was passed.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that members may have leave to print remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Within what length of time?

Mr. SIMS. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

HAWAIIAN SILVER.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill S. 2210, with the committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves to suspend the rules and pass Senate bill 2210 with sundry amendments. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2210) relating to Hawaiian silver coinage and silver certificates.

Be it enacted, etc., That the silver coins that were coined under the laws of Hawaii, when the same are not mutilated or abraded below the standard of circulation, shall be received at the par of their face value in payment of all dues to the government of the Territory of Hawaii and of the United States, and the same shall not again be put into circulation, but they shall be recoined in the mints as United States coins.

SEC. 2. That when such coins have been received by either Government they shall be transmitted to the mint at San Francisco, in sums of not less than $500, to be recoined into subsidiary silver coins of the United States, the expense of transportation to be paid by the United States.

SEC. 3. That any collector of customs or of internal revenue of the United States in the Hawaiian Islands shall, if he is so directed by the Secretary of the Treasury, exchange standard silver coins of the United States that are in his custody as such collector with the Government of Hawaii, or with any person desiring to make such exchange, for coins of the Government of Hawaii, at their face value when the same are not abraded below the lawful standard of circulation, and the Treasurer of the United States, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized to deposit such silver coins of the United States as shall be necessary with the collector of customs or of internal revenue at Honolulu or at any Government depository for the purpose of making such exchange under such regulations as he may prescribe.

SEC. 4. That any silver coins struck by the government of Hawaii that are mutilated or abraded below such standard may be presented for recoinage at any mint in the United States by the person owning the same, or his or her agents, in sums of not less than $50, and such owner shall be paid for such coins by the superintendent of the mint the bullion value per troy ounce of the fine silver they contain in standard silver coin of the United States, and such bullion shall be coined into subsidiary coinage of the United States.

SEC. 5. That silver coins heretofore struck by the government of Hawaii shall continue to be legal tender for debts in the Territory of Hawaii, in accordance with the laws of the Republic of Hawaii, until the 1st day of January, 1904, and not afterwards.

SEC. 6. That any silver certificates heretofore issued by the government of the Hawaiian Islands, intended to be circulated as money, shall be redeemed by the Territorial government of Hawaii on or before the 1st day of January, 1905, and after said date it shall be unlawful to circulate the same as money.

SEC. 7. That nothing in this act contained shall bind the United States to redeem any silver certificates issued by the goverment of Hawaii, or any silver coin issued by such government, except in the manner and upon the conditions stated in this act for the recoinage of Hawaiian silver.

SEC. 8. That the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, from any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of the expenses of transporting said coins from the Hawaiian Islands to the mint at San Francisco, and a return of a like amount in the subsidiary coins of the United States to the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Speaker, this bill involves a single simple proposition. It proposes the retirement of the silver coin in Hawaii and its replacement by the subsidiary silver coin of the United States. It proposes to do for Hawaii practically what was done for Porto Rico in the act of March 12 or April 12, 1900. The conditions are somewhat different, of course. In Porto Rico their silver was worth at that time only about 50 cents on the dollar, and the act authorized the taking of that money at 60 cents on the dollar.

The Hawaiian silver coinage has always circulated at par, and this bill provides that it shall be received by the officers of the United States Treasury at par and replaced by the subsidiary coinage of the United States. All of the coinage of the Hawaiian Islands was done under the act of 1883. All of their silver coins were coined during the years 1884, 1885, and 1886, and during that period of time about $1,000,000—I think exactly a million dollars—was coined in silver coin. There were 500,000 silver dollars, $350,000 in half dollars, $125,000 in quarter dollars, and $25,000 in dimes. This constituted the total coinage of the Hawaiian Islands, and the proposition is, as I have already stated, to retire this silver coinage and replace it by the subsidiary silver coinage of the United States.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield for a question?

Mr. SOUTHARD. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. How does the Hawaiian silver coin circulate in Hawaii—at par?

Mr. SOUTHARD. Yes, sir; at par, and always has done so.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the Federal Government should receive this coin at par and recoin it into subsidiary coin, it would lose how much on the dollar?

Mr. SOUTHARD. Under the provisions of this bill there will be a slight gain to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Could not the Federal Government go into the market and buy bullion and make an equivalent amount of subsidiary coin for 50 per cent of the par value of Hawaiian silver coin now?

Mr. SOUTHARD. This silver coin has always circulated at par.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I know, but could not the Government now go into the market and buy bullion and coin subsidiary coin and save at least 50 per cent of what it would if it took the Hawaiian coin at par and recoined it into subsidiary coin?

Mr. SOUTHARD. I suppose the Government could buy bullion and replace that coin more cheaply than it could by taking the coin at par, but it would be manifestly unfair to the people of the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes, but will it not be manifestly unfair to the people of the United States if they take this coin at gold par and recoin it into subsidiary coin, when they could get the equivalent in bullion at one-half the amount of money?

Mr. SOUTHARD. Every dollar of this coin is circulating at par and is a legal tender in the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Who made it a legal tender?

Mr. SOUTHARD. The government of Hawaii.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. What relation does the United States bear toward it?

Mr. SOUTHARD. The United States Government has become responsible no further than it assumed responsibility in the organic act.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Did it provide for the maintenance of the Hawaiian silver coin on a par with gold?

Mr. SOUTHARD. It does not expressly, but the Hawaiian silver coin is maintained at a par value with gold.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the act of Congress make it legal tender?

Mr. SOUTHARD. No further than that they are legal tender by reason of circulating at par in Hawaii. The act of Congress does not make the coins of Hawaii legal tender.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not see why we should take these coins at par and recoin them into subsidiary coin when we could make the equivalent amount of money by buying bullion. It would be a generous act to Hawaii, I admit, but directly against the interests of the people of the United States.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Would the United States take a single dollar of Hawaiian money and replace it with less than the value of that which it took?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. What is the object of taking it if it will circulate in Hawaii on a par with gold? What is the object of it?

Mr. SOUTHARD. I will state two or three objects. One object is to have a uniform currency. Another object is that while favorable conditions exist to-day, they may not always remain as they are in the Hawaiian Islands. It is something that is universally desired by the people of Hawaii. It is something which is desired by our own Government. So far as I know, everybody wants it. The bill passed the Senate, as I understand, without any division. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. So far as I know, there is no objection from any source in any of the provisions of this bill. The Hawaiian coin has a limited circulation, and it doubtless would be to the advantage of Hawaii to replace their coin by that of the United States.

All it costs the Government is the expense of coinage, and the Government will be more than reimbursed by what, in discussing the bill in the Senate, was called the seigniorage; that is, the gain which will come to the Government by reason of the coinage of 500,000 silver dollars and replacing them by an equal amount in half dollars.

This bill, as I have said, came from the Senate, and, as announced, it has been amended. It was referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he made a single suggestion. The original bill provided that the expense of collecting these coins, bringing them to this country and taking them back to Hawaii, should be borne equally by the Hawaiian Territorial Government and by the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury made the suggestion that it would be impracticable to divide this expense, and he suggested that as the Treasury would receive some gain by reason of the coinage of the 500,000 silver dollars, the bill should provide that the expense of bringing the money here and taking it back should be borne by the Treasury of the United States.

That suggestion is carried out in two amendments which are presented in this bill. Section 2 has been stricken out and a new section substituted, and an additional section has been added to the Senate bill appropriating $10,000 for the purpose of defraying the expenses of this transportation. In my judgment this expense will be very small. But there will be some expense and some provision should be made for it. That is the suggestion embodied in the two amendments I have mentioned.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Was this coin maintained at par with gold before the acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. SOUTHARD. It was.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. By what means—by limiting the amount?

Mr. SOUTHARD. I have never been able to see just why it was maintained at par. In the first place, as already observed, the silver coinage was in a very limited amount.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It was coined by the Government.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Coined by the United States.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It was coined by the Hawaiian government, I believe.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Yes; coined by the Hawaiian government, but coined at San Francisco at the United States mint. The fact remains, I presume, that it is largely the use of this coinage that keeps it at par. Of course, the larger amount of money circulating in Hawaii is American money. Its limited quantity, legal-tender quality, and its use, everything connected with it—this situation has served to keep it at par. It always has been at par, and it is now circulating at par.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the passage of this bill for the reason that I do not see any necessity for interfering with the money that now exists in Hawaii. Hawaii has about $500,000 in what is termed Hawaiian dollars. They contain the same quantity of silver as does the American dollar—412½ grains, nine-tenths fine. On those silver dollars the Hawaiian government has issued silver certificates, so that a large part—two-thirds or three-fourths, or it may be four-fifths—of the silver dollars have had silver certificates issued upon them.

These dollars are as perfect dollars as the United States dollars. They were coined by our mint. They were just as carefully coined as any of our own coins. Consequently there is no occasion on account of bad coinage to substitute dollars of our own or to substitute subsidiary coin.

In the next place, the subsidiary coin of Hawaii was also coined by our Government, and these subsidiary coins contain exactly the same number of grains of silver as the corresponding coin of the United States. These coins all circulate at gold valuation, although there is no gold reserve behind them. Consequently there is no question here of these coins being at or going to a discount. Although some fears have been expressed by some people in this regard, no one has ever offered to sell one of these coins at a discount of so much as a half of 1 per cent.

Now, my judgment is that if we let this question alone it will solve itself. The passengers on every vessel that lands at Honolulu carry away as souvenirs some of this silver money. Almost everyone on the steamer I was on collected and retained some of the coins of those islands. I am sure I did. I have not any doubt the time will come when these Hawaiian coins will actually be worth more in the market as souvenirs than their face value in Hawaii.

Mr. GILBERT. How many are there?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Five hundred thousand of the dollars and some less of the subsidiary coin—probably $450,000 of subsidiary coin.

Now, I can not see any reason why the Government of the United States should be put to the expense of transporting from the Hawaiian Islands this money, melting it down, and recoining it into exactly corresponding amounts of United States money. This is not the same problem as that we had in Porto Rico, because there they had a different kind of coin, not containing the same number of grains of silver or bearing any relation to our money whatever, but the coins of Hawaii are identical with ours and they are identical in purchasing power as our money. If you wanted to, you might pass a law giving the Hawaiian coins the legal-tender powers in the United States which they possess there, which would make uniformity, but there is no complaint that these coins will not pass, there is no complaint that they do not have free circulation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the passage of this bill will cause a useless expenditure of money. Besides, this bill provides that the Hawaiian dollars shall be coined into subsidiary coin. Now, it is true that the dollar is not full legal tender in Hawaii. It is true it is limited to ten or twenty dollars, I forget which, but the power exists in Hawaii of issuing silver certificates upon those silver dollars in denominations of more than $1, and the result of it is those silver certificates constitute principally the circulating medium of the islands. Now, to provide that these dollars shall be melted down and replaced by subsidiary United States coin is evidently going to interfere somewhat seriously with the currency there.

Their five-dollar and ten-dollar certificates will unquestionably be affected, and this bill proposes to supplant them with subsidiary American coin. I do not see that any good purpose can be subserved by that. The silver coins pass current. They are not at a discount. Some people have thought they might go to a discount, but anyone who knows the commerce of those islands, who knows you can pay with these coins dues to the government, taxes upon lands and other property in the islands, and debts contracted must be satisfied that they can not go to a discount.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Suppose the gentleman were trading with this country and had $100,000 of Hawaiian silver. Would the gentleman just as soon have it as American silver?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Supposing the gentleman were a banker over there and had accumulated $100,000 of Hawaiian silver?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Would the gentleman as soon have it as American silver?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, I think the rate of exchange would be identically the same. They never had any difficulty in dealing with us before they were admitted as a part of this country.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Supposing the gentleman wanted to use that in this country, can the gentleman imagine conditions under which that would not be as valuable?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will tell the gentleman what would be a good deal better than that and would not cost anything, and that is to give those coins legal-tender power in the United States the same that they possess in Hawaii. That would answer the purpose without any melting of these coins, and without recoining them into subsidiary coin.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Does not the gentleman think that we ought to have uniformity in our currency system?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think uniformity should exist if it can be obtained at a reasonable cost.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There is a very practical uniformity now.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is practical uniformity in the number of grains of silver contained in each piece.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They both circulate exactly alike.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Exactly. You never ask when you are in Hawaii whether it is Hawaiian coin or coin of the United States. Now, Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons why I oppose this bill is because it melts down these dollars and makes subsidiary coin out of them, and I do not think that is right, although these dollars have not the full legal-tender quality that our American coins have.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If the gentleman will permit a suggestion, I would say that no other dollar is substituted, but subsidiary coin is substituted.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It substitutes subsidiary coin, according to the terms of this bill. Now, there is another question which is raised by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER]. I do not know whether there is any duty resting upon us contained in the agreement of annexation between Hawaii and this Government to replace their money with ours. If there is it ought to be complied with. But if the United States is to coin

$1,000,000 in subsidiary coins for circulation in Hawaii it can buy the bullion at half what it will take to purchase the Hawaiian coins. If according to the terms of annexation it is the duty of Hawaii to take care of her issues of money and we to take care of our coins, which have always been in circulation there, then to pass this bill will be to make a gift to that Territory of $500,000. Now, I do not know whether there is an obligation or not. If there is it ought to be complied with.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What sort of an obligation does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know whether we agreed to take care of these coins or not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We did not. There is no such provision in the treaty.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know whether we did or not. If we did, we ought to do it, no matter whether it costs $500,000 or $10,000,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We simply continued the existing laws in force, which made these dollars legal tender.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish to say in conclusion that this bill involves silver coins of the value of about $950,000, $500,000 of which are in dollars, and of which $450,000 are hypothecated for the redemption of silver certificates, issued in denominations, I understand, from $5 up. The balance is in subsidiary coin, containing identically the same number of grains of silver that our corresponding coins contain, and known as quarters, halves, and dimes, exactly the same as ours.

They all circulate in Hawaii at a par with our coin, one being freely exchanged for the other. The cost of transporting this coin from Hawaii to San Francisco and coining it into subsidiary coin of American money and the reshipment back will amount to a considerable sum. The expense is entirely unnecessary and will disturb their circulating medium. You can not substitute subsidiary coin for their large silver certificates without producing a redundancy of small money and a shortage of large money. Besides, I am absolutely opposed to the melting of silver dollars for the purpose of coining into subsidiary coins. For these reasons I am opposed to the passage of this bill.

How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DALZELL). The gentleman has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. MADDOX. Before the gentleman does that I wish to ask him who suffers the loss of the $450,000?

Mr. SHAFROTH. That loss will be suffered by the United States.

Mr. MADDOX. It will?

Mr. SHAFROTH. In this way: It could buy the bullion out of which to make this corresponding amount of subsidiary coin for $400,000 less than it could take up the Hawaiian coins and melt them down.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Who gets the revenues from the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Some of the revenues our Government gets and some the Territory itself gets.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But a vast amount collected from Hawaii goes into the United States Treasury.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, some; but I do not know the amount.

Mr. HILL. We are responsible for this anyway. We can not help ourselves.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I shall use that much time; but I want to say that on my way home from the Orient we stopped at Honolulu, and there, as elsewhere, I made it my duty to investigate matters that would be pertinent to our action here in Congress. Therefore, I at once riveted my attention on the money question, knowing that we had had that question up in Congress and would have it up again.

I found that the Hawaiian money passed pari passu with the American money; that the Hawaiian dollar passed just as freely as the American dollar; that there was no objection whatever from anybody to allowing the money to remain just as it is.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I should like to ask the gentleman the authority for this Hawaiian money.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I was just about to state that the "existing" laws of Hawaii were continued when we annexed Hawaii, and the "existing" law of Hawaii made this money, as I recollect it, a full legal tender.

Mr. HILL. Up to $10.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, say $10; but my recollection was that it was full legal tender.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Was that by the terms of the treaty?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; the "existing" law of Hawaii made this money legal tender, and it has remained so by the statute of annexation and is so now, and that is the law of that land now.

Mr. SNODGRASS. It is a part of the law of the United States?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes, as stated. The statute of annexation continued the existing Hawaiian laws, which laws made the Hawaiian dollar a legal tender. I regret the hearings have not been printed. My recollection is the ex-collector of United States revenue there said that it was a full legal tender, but if it was only for 5 cents I say that in Hawaii these coins passed freely. It was taken by everybody as freely as American money. There was no difficulty with anybody in taking the money. I asked them if there was any trouble and they said "no." The bankers, who get their money in small amounts, said they did not want any change in the money made, and said it was good enough for them; so with the street car men and merchants. The gentleman from Connecticut states it only passes as legal tender up to $10. He may be correct.

I so understood the answer to the question asked when we had the hearings, and the gentleman who deposed at the time made a statement, which is a part of his testimony, in respect to the law; but it seems the testimony has not been printed, so I am not definite about that. But this money is absolutely acceptable to everybody. It is acceptable to the Government of the United States; it is acceptable to the Hawaiian government; it is acceptable to the capitalists there; acceptable to the street car men, and to the laborers of that country.

Will you pray tell me what right and what justice there is in grinding it up into subsidiary coins at the expense of somebody, the Government of the United States at least, if not those now holding this money? Hence it is a matter of business, is a matter of economy, is a matter of justice to those people who hold this money not to change it. They sustain the loss.

Why, everybody over there is paid in this money. I changed my money, and in a few minutes I had my pockets full of it, and I had no trouble with it. Why should you, then, strike down this money? Why should it be ground into subsidiary coin, that has a limited tender, when there is no complaint; when it is in the pockets of the people and the laborers, and they are not complaining? I say there is no wisdom, no justice, nor right in doing so, and hence it is that I object to the whole proposition. Let it alone, and let it do, as it is, full legal-tender money duty for everybody.

Mr. SOUTHARD. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, if I can have the attention of the House for a few moments while I explain this bill I believe that every man on this floor will vote for it. The government of Hawaii under the old system had coined a million dollars of silver. It is all subsidiary. It has no legal-tender power in excess of $10. The bill is purely a business matter. It has passed the Senate unanimously. Senator TELLER, of Colorado, made a speech in favor of the bill, and there was no opposing vote when the bill passed the Senate early in the session. It has not only passed at this session, but it passed at the last session.

Now, the facts in the case are simply these: Under the old government a million dollars of subsidiary coin was coined. The dollar was subsidiary, with tender limited to $10. The only difference between that dollar and ours is this: While theirs corresponded with ours in fineness and in size it does not correspond in its legal-tender quality. We are responsible for them. We have to take them anyway, and it is simply a question of whether we will have two kinds of coin. It can be bought at a discount and sold at the bullion rates if the banks refuse to accept it in any future transaction. It can not be refused on existing transactions, but they can draw notes or documents saying that in the future only American coin shall be received.

Now, the Post-Office Department of the Government says, "What are we going to do with these two kinds of money in circulation? If the banks refuse to take it we shall have to take it in unlimited quantities." I have here a letter sent to me from the Post-Office Department only a few days ago, asking information as to what they were to do. It was signed by Mr. Wynne, the First Assistant Postmaster-General, inclosing a letter from the postmaster at Honolulu, by which you will see the position in which the Government, not the people of Hawaii, is placed from the fact that the Government is called on to take it.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is this money received by the Government for customs dues?

Mr. HILL. It is legal tender up to $10.

Mr. HOPKINS. If our Government receives it at its face value, does the gentleman believe that it would be depreciated in any private transaction?

Mr. HILL. Why, certainly I believe it would. It had only legal-tender quality for $10.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the Government receives it at par value, it will go everywhere.

Mr. HILL. Why does not a Mexican dollar go as far in Mexico? But why argue theoretically on a business proposition of this kind?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman know it is full legal tender between this Government and the people?

Mr. HILL. Its legal-tender quality is limited to the sum of $10.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does it not go up on all sorts of contracts between the people there?

Mr. HILL. Do you suppose anybody would take this in amounts of more than $10.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is an evasive answer to my question.

Mr. HILL. It does not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is accepted by everybody there.

Mr. HILL. It has no legal function outside of $10.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But it is received over there for all amounts.

Mr. HILL. Not in this coin.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I was there, and it was accepted for all duties.

Mr. HILL. In this country?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Not in this country, but in that country.

Mr. HILL. The following is the letter:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
DIVISION OF THE POSTAL MONEY ORDER SYSTEM,
Washington, D. C., June 2, 1902.

SIR: In connection with the matter of the redemption of coin of Hawaii, upon which subject some legislation is pending, please find herewith, for your information, a copy of a letter from the postmaster at Honolulu, Hawaii, of date of the 20th ultimo.

It would seem that the subject is one well worthy of prompt attention.

Respectfully,
R. J. WYNNE,
First Assistant Postmaster-General,

Hon. E. J. HILL,
Chairman Committee on Banking and Currency,
House of Representatives.

HONOLULU POST-OFFICE, Honolulu, H. I., May 20, 1902.

Hon. FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: With further reference to my letter of November 13 last, in re Hawaiian silver coin, I would again call your attention to the fact that some of the bankers here are again agitating the advisability of not receiving Hawaiian coin.

One bank here has deposited in its vaults about $200,000 silver, about four-fifths of which is Hawaiian, which they claim can not be sent to any other part of the United States in payment of debts, leaving about only one-fifth American silver available for that purpose.

While there is no threat made that they will refuse Hawaiian silver, there is a hint given that they may do so, in which case this office would have to do the same,

About the first of each month a great proportion of this coin is shipped to the various plantations to pay off the employees, but by the middle of the month it finds its way back to Honolulu again, considerable of it through the post-office, and is soon piled up in the banks as before.

I submit the above facts in order that the Department may be aware of the conditions that exist here, and perhaps take some immediate action before it is taken up here with perhaps serious results to the community.

Respectfully,
JOS. M. OAT, Postmaster.

Now, gentlemen, that is all there is of it. We can not help ourselves.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield one minute to the gentleman.

Mr. HILL. There is only this about it—we have got to take it, either through the custom-house or the post-office. We will make $15,000 by recoining it into our own money.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If that is the case, how will it bankrupt the United States to coin silver money? [Laughter.]

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes, and the gentleman from Colorado has two minutes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Connecticut, I will say that it seems to me that because a bill may pass the other body without a contest is no reason why it should pass this body. In my judgment there is no substantial reason for the passage of this bill. These coins circulate at par and contain the same number of grains of silver as the American coins. They will take care of themselves if you let them alone.

All of the tourists that go to Hawaii take away a number of them to keep as souvenirs. In time they will consume the entire circulation, and it will not cost the Government one penny. If there was no other reason than that, it seems to me the bill should not pass.

Besides, there are $500,000 upon which silver certificates have been issued in denominations of five and ten dollars. If you are going to substitute subsidiary coin you will inconvenience the people of Hawaii. Subsidiary silver coin is not as convenient as bills of five and ten dollar denominations in large transactions. The fact that the United States Government receives this silver coin in payment of duties to the Government, the fact that the Territorial government receives them in payment of all taxes—municipal and county—ought to convince anyone that there is no danger of them going to a discount, or that any of this money will go to a discount.

To recoin this money, to bring it to the United States and melt it down and recoin it into coins of precisely the same number of grains as exists in our money, will involve the expenditure of a considerable sum. If there is no obligation resting upon the Government to redeem it, if Hawaii was to take care of her money and we were to take care of ours, you can readily see that the Government of the United States will lose $450,000 by recoinage, because it can buy one million of bullion in the market and coin it into subsidiary coin by the payment of $450,000. If there is any obligation I would not allow that to weigh one particle.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman admits his whole case away when he says that the coins circulate under different conditions. Two coins circulating under admittedly different conditions will at some time be of varying value. It can not possibly be otherwise, and when he says that he should oppose a law making an Hawaiian dollar unlimited legal tender, he admits his whole case. It is for the purpose of keeping $500,000 more silver in circulation that the gentleman takes the position that he does. So far as we know, the gentleman and one or two others are the only ones who have interposed any objection to what is proposed in the bill. The people of Hawaii are all in favor of it. Our Treasury Department is in favor of it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Have you any petitions?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from Ohio says that the people of Hawaii are in favor of it. Where does he get his information?

Mr. SOUTHARD. If the gentleman from Tennessee had read the report in this case, he would not ask that question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, as I have not the report here, I ask the gentleman the question. I deny that the people of Hawaii do want it.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I get it in part from a letter of S. M. Damon, published in the report. I get it also from other sources. This is legislation uniformly demanded, it is something that everybody wants, and the bill ought to pass without objection. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to suspend the rules and agree to the amendment and pass the bill as amended.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes had it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. SOUTHARD (before the announcement of the vote). Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are demanded by the gentleman from Ohio.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 114, nays 71, answered "present" 13, not voting 153; as follows:

R. 14046) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. TILLMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8840) granting an increase of pension to John H. Lauchly.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the bill (S. 3992) granting an increase of pension to David M. McKnight.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

Mr. FOX, for ten days, on account of important business.

Mr. RHEA of Virginia, for one week, on account of important business.

Mr. KLUTTZ, for one week, on account of serious illness in his family.

PRISON-SHIP MARTYRS AT FORT GREENE, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Speaker, by authority from the Committee on the Library, I move that the rules be suspended and that the amendment to House joint resolution No. 6, in relation to a monument to prison-ship martyrs at Fort Greene, Brooklyn, N. Y., submitted by the committee, be agreed to, and that as amended the resolution be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, by direction of the Committee on the Library, calls up House joint resolution No. 6, and moves that the rules be suspended and that the amendments be agreed to, and the resolution as thus amended be passed. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000 as a part contribution to the erection of said monument in Fort Greene Park, in the borough of Brooklyn, city and State of New York: Provided, however, That said sums shall not be payable until there has been raised, by private subscription and by public appropriations as aforesaid, sums aggregating an additional $100,000: And provided further, That said moneys shall not be paid for the erection of a monument, plans for which shall not have been approved by the Secretary of War of the United States and the governor of the State of New York and mayor of the city of New York; and the said moneys shall be expended under the joint supervision of the said Secretary and said governor and said mayor.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is an appropriation of $100,000 as a part contribution to the erection of a monument to the memory of the so-called prison-ship martyrs at Fort Greene Park, Brooklyn, N. Y. The State of New York has already appropriated $25,000 and has authorized the city of New York to appropriate $50,000, and there have been raised $25,000 by private subscriptions; in all, $100,000. The appropriation authorized in the resolution does not take effect until the other $100,000 has been paid in.

During the Revolutionary war nearly 20,000 naval and military prisoners, confined in hulks anchored at Wallabout Bay, the present site of the United States navy-yard, Brooklyn, N. Y., died because of the cruelties they suffered at the hands of their British jailers. They were buried on the shore near the hulks. In 1808 they were given Christian burial by the Tammany Society or Columbian Order, and in 1873 they were moved to Fort Greene Park, where they now lie. Similar resolutions or bills have been reported to the House in the Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, Fifty-first, Fifty-second, Fifty-fourth, Fifty-fifth, and Fifty-sixth Congresses, and the Committee on the Library is unanimous in thinking that it is only right that the resolution should be agreed to.

The resolution was introduced by my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who has labored unceasingly for the success of this patriotic project, with which his name will always be most appropriately associated. I yield five minutes to my colleague [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, unless further explanation is needed I will not occupy the time of the House, but will ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCLELLAN].

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor of the motion, the amendment was agreed to, and the resolution as amended passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, who informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On June 1, 1902:

H. R. 11591. An act for the relief of Stanley & Patterson, and to authorize a pay director of the United States Navy to issue a duplicate pay check.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Mr. McCLEARY. By direction of the Committee on the Library, I move that the rules be suspended and that the bill (S. 5269) to provide a commission to secure plans and designs for a monument or memorial to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States, be passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota calls up the bill S. 5269, by direction of the Committee on the Library, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of War be, and they are hereby, created a commission to secure plans and designs for a monument or memorial to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. That the said commission shall report the result of their action to Congress as soon as practicable after a decision has been reached.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a second, but I am willing that one should be considered as ordered.

Mr. McCLEARY. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLEARY. Mr. Speaker, it seems almost unnecessary to present any argument in favor of this Senate bill. It is thirty-seven years since the spirit of Abraham Lincoln took its flight, and in the capital city of the nation there is no worthy memorial of his great life. The bill provides for a commission, to consist of the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the House, the Secretary of State, and Secretary of War, to secure plans and a design for such a monument. There is no authority to do further than to secure these designs and submit them to the Congress for its approval or disapproval.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I have not read the bill, but I would like to inquire of the gentleman where it is proposed to erect this monument?

Mr. McCLEARY. In the city of Washington.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Does it provide that it shall be erected on a Government reservation or have we to purchase some location?

Mr. McCLEARY. That is not provided in the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. So far as I am concerned, I can see no objection.

Mr. McCLEARY. I will say to the gentleman that in all probability this memorial will be erected on a Government reservation.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I did not catch the names of the commissioners who were to select the plans. Will the gentleman read them?

Mr. McCLEARY. The commission is to consist of the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the House, the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of War, and the authority granted the commission is simply to secure plans and a design.

Mr. CLAYTON. How much does the bill carry?

Mr. McCLEARY. Twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Suppose that the four members of this commission divide equally, how can a design be chosen?

Mr. McCLEARY. These commissions usually consist of four members.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY] if it has been decided as to what inscription will be placed on this monument? If not, I suggest to gentlemen on the other side that Abraham Lincoln really believed in the Declaration of Independence, a fact which the gentlemen on the Republican side of this House have possibly forgotten.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Illinois, or does the gentleman from Illinois take the floor in his own time?

Mr. CANNON. Either way; I do not care in whose time it is. I should be glad to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MCCLEARY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman any matter in his mind as to where this monument or memorial is to be located?

Mr. MCCLEARY. Nothing further than that it is to be located in the city of Washington.

Mr. CANNON. The reason I ask is that, in common with every other member of this House, I believe, I am in entire harmony with the erection of a memorial, in the city of Washington, to perpetuate the name and life of Abraham Lincoln, and I hope and believe that this memorial, when erected, will be a proper one. The sum of $25,000 is appropriated merely for plans. I judge from that that it is to be a proper monument. That amount expended in architects' fees in the erection of a building would indicate a total expenditure of half a million dollars. Now, I am not going talk about the expenditure. I am satisfied it will be what it should be, considering all the circumstances and the character of that man.

But I am a little desirous to ask my friend a question or two. We have had lately a lot of plans by a Commission known as the Parking Commission. The Senate of the United States begot upon itself a Commission, and has devoted from its contingent fund the sum of $50,000 to enable this Commission to fructify, and over here in the Library of Congress, without any authority of law, a cuckoo's egg, occupying one great side of the library, are models which show the work of this self-begotten child. How long these models are to stay there I do not know. Shown upon that model are splendid avenues, memorial bridges, and a great many other things. And, if I am not mistaken, down near the old Naval Observatory is a place reserved for a memorial to Abraham Lincoln. Am I correct?

Mr. MCCLEARY. I am not prepared to say that the gentleman is not correct, because that has nothing to do with this case.

Mr. CANNON. Well, yes and no. Let us see whether it has or not. I am not going, by my action, without at least a word of inquiry, to have the patriotic sentiment that abounds in 80,000,000 people used to put a monument where it ought not to be. Now, if I supposed that this memorial was to be builded down near the old Naval Observatory and used to make an argument in favor of building a memorial bridge, and that the memorial was to stand there through all time, right upon the bank of that river and close to the flats, where the monument itself would take fever and ague, let alone a living man, I should object. If this $25,000 is to be expended for plans, and the whole thing is to be worked out in connection with a site of that kind, then I should try to see if we could not apply some remedy. If, on the contrary, it is to work out plans that will fit a proper location, why then I am entirely content, and for that reason I have asked my friend these questions.

I notice that the Secretary of War, the Secretary of State, the chairmen of the Library Committees of the House and of the Senate make up the Commission. I am with my friend for a memorial. I am against anything—and I want to set this back fire now—I am against anything that will work out anybody's plans or anybody's schemes that will not place that memorial where all the people will and must see it when they come to Washington. Why, we used to have a statue erected as a memorial of Adjutant-General Rawlins down a little bit southwest of the War, State, and Navy building. It stood there, lonesome and silent, except as the occasional explorer—one in ten thousand—would inquire about it and hunt it up, until finally Congress directed that it be moved up to Eighth or Ninth street and Pennsylvania avenue, so it would not be lonesome.

Now, that is about all I wish to say about it. I wanted to say this much, without offending the feelings of anybody, and in view of this scheme, in view of the birth of this unnatural child, born not in lawful legislative wedlock, I wanted to say that much by way of protest against the action on the part of this Commission in failing to do its duty and giving us the location and its recommendation that ought to be had. [Applause.]

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Is he in favor of this motion to suspend the rules and pass the resolution? I could not tell after listening to his speech.

Mr. CANNON. Am I in favor of it? Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. All right.

Mr. CANNON. I shall vote for it; but I wanted to say this much, and I hope my good friend in charge of this bill, the Representative from Minnesota, will say what he has to say if he thinks anything I have said has anything of injustice in it touching this Commission, and if he does not, then I shall vote for this bill; and, if I am spared when its report is made, I shall be at perfect freedom to contest the confirmation of that location, if, in my judgment, the contest ought to be made. But I take time by the forelock. Now, the question of the location of a monument means much to the monument itself. What would suit a monument in low ground would not suit a monument in high ground. What would suit it in a populous place, where the men, women, and children would see it almost daily, or where all the citizens would see it in a great city, would mean one thing; if one was hid away where one in ten thousand in a great city would not see the monument, that would be another thing. While I do not desire to be hypercritical, it seems to me apt that I should indulge in this much language about it.

Mr. MCCLEARY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois will appreciate the fact, of course, that even if this bill passes and "the gentleman from Minnesota" becomes one of the members of this commission, I would have no authority at this time to speak in such a way as to bind that commission. I can simply say this, in reply to the inquiries of my friend from Illinois, that this bill was introduced in the Senate by Senator CULLOM, and my understanding is that his purpose in introducing it was simply to get a proper memorial here to him whom all the people, North and South, of all parties, want to see thus honored. Now, if that commission makes a report that is not satisfactory to the House, the House has full recourse. At this time I can say only that this bill provides for a commission. I can not tell what the action of that commission will be.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to me for a minute?

Mr. MCCLEARY. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I believe that this resolution or some such resolution should pass; but I do submit that the form of the resolution is wrong. I do not believe that there is a gentleman on this side of the House who does not believe that the Government of the United States should erect a proper memorial to the memory of Abraham Lincoln; but I do not believe that the resolution should have been so framed as to provide a commission composed of four members of the majority party and no member of the minority party in this House or in the United States.

The memory of Abraham Lincoln belongs exclusively to no party. If it were possible for either party to claim that it specially honored him for his love of our country and its peculiar institutions, then at this period in our history that claim might be set up by this side of the House. But there is no politics in this measure, and there should be no politics. The commission should have been fairly divided between the two sides and the different parties. I trust there will be no objection, however, to the passage of the resolution. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MCCLEARY. In answer to the gentleman from Tennessee, and I appreciate the spirit in which the suggestion of the gentleman has been made, I would say that this commission is framed without any thought of politics. This is the first time that politics ever came into my mind in connection with it. It provides that the commission shall consist of the chairmen of the committees having this subject in charge, and the Secretary of War, who has general custody of the public grounds, and the Secretary of State to fill out the commission. There was absolutely no thought of politics in it. There is no one who believes for a moment that there is anybody on either side of the House who does not approve of the general proposition, and so far were we from all thought of politics that it never occurred to us that anybody would raise the question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yet it is true they will all be Republicans.

Mr. MCCLEARY. It is true, but it is simply because of their official stations. Mr. Speaker, in view of the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be amended, and that he himself—the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON]—be added to this commission. [Loud general applause].

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have a right to be heard on this matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend until the Chair puts the request. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that he be permitted to amend the bill so as to include the gentleman from Tennessee. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennesssee. Now, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate fully the motive which prompts the gentleman from Minnesota to make this request, prompted, as I believe he was, by the able gentleman from Illinois. I think in the main his request is a proper one, but I do not think he ought to have applied it to myself in view of what I have said on the floor. While I appreciate the distinguished honor which the gentleman wishes to confer upon me and the spirit in which his suggestion has been received by the House, I must decline and ask the gentleman to substitute the head of the minority of his committee, who is a member on this side of the House, as a member of that commission. I think that is fair and right.

Mr. McCLEARY. Mr. Speaker, in offering the suggestion I did I tried to carry out the spirit of my friend's remarks a moment ago, and he was selected because he is the leader of the Democratic side and, therefore, by reason of his official position, it was entirely proper. [Applause.] I trust that the gentleman's modesty may not be permitted to debar us from having his distinguished services upon that commission. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the resolution as amended was agreed to.

SURVIVORS OF CERTAIN INDIAN WARS.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and take up the bill (S. 640) to extend the provisions, limitations, and benefits of an act entitled "An act granting pensions to the survivors of the Indian wars of 1832 to 1842, inclusive, known as the Black Hawk war, Creek war, Cherokee disturbances, and the Seminole war," approved July 27, 1892, agree to the amendment recommended by the committee, and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey moves to suspend the rules, take up Senate bill 640, and that as amended it do pass.

The Clerk read the bill as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions, limitations, and benefits of the act entitled "An act granting pensions to survivors of the Indian wars of 1832 to 1842, inclusive, known as the Black Hawk war, Creek war, Cherokee disturbances, and the Seminole war," approved July 27, 1892, be, and the same are hereby, extended, from the date of the passage of this act, to the surviving officers and enlisted men, including marines, militia, and volunteers of the military and naval service of the United States who served for thirty days or more and were honorably discharged under the United States military, State, Territorial, or provisional authorities in the Florida and Georgia Seminole Indian war of 1817 and 1818; the Fevre River Indian war of Illinois of 1827; the Sac and Fox Indian war of 1831; the Sabine Indian disturbances of 1836 and 1837; the Cayuse Indian war of 1847 and 1848, on the Pacific coast; the Florida wars with the Seminole Indians from 1842 to 1858, inclusive; the Texas and New Mexico Indian war of 1849 to 1856; the California Indian disturbances of 1851 and 1852; the Utah Indian disturbances of 1850 to 1853, inclusive, and the Oregon and Washington Territory Indian wars from 1851 to 1856, inclusive; and also to include the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted men: Provided, That such widows have not remarried: And provided further, That where there is no record of enlistment or muster into the service of the United States in any of the wars mentioned in this act the record of pay by the United States shall be accepted as full and satisfactory proof of such enlistment and service: And provided further, That all contracts heretofore made between the beneficiaries under this act and pension attorneys and claim agents are hereby declared null and void.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear some explanation in regard to this bill, and therefore I demand a second.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that a second may be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, this bill simply extends the benefits of the act of July 27, 1892, to the wars named in the act which follows the precedents of all the service-pension acts from the formation of this Government, including no wars where not less than forty years has passed since they closed.

This proposed legislation, if enacted into law, would follow the line of every precedent established since the war of the Revolution. That war covered a period from 1775 to April 11, 1783. The act which gave them a service pension, or rather a dependent service pension, was passed in 1818, and in 1832, forty-nine years after the close of the war, the first service-pension act was passed by this Government relating to the service of the Revolutionary war. The survivors of the wars of 1812 and the Indian wars and the Mexican war were all given service pensions by acts passed forty years after the close of these wars.

There are two or three wars mentioned in this measure which were considered to be pensioned by Congress when they passed the act of 1892, but they were excluded by virtue of the dates not covering that period.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Can the gentleman give any idea of the cost of this measure?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. The number of beneficiaries under the act as reported by the Commissioner of Pensions about two and one-half years ago was something like 7,600, and the term of expectancy was about seven and one-half years, and the total amount of the first payment was $730,000, or a total payment of about $5,000,000 for the whole period. That, by recent communication from the Pension Department, has been reduced to a total number now estimated of about 6,400, and the first payment on the bill would be about $100,000 less than the amount I have given. So that the total amount will be about a million dollars or a million and a half less than the amount estimated two and a half years ago.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. I want to know if this bill comes from the gentleman's committee with a unanimous report?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. It does.

Mr. LESSLER. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the number of beneficiaries amounted to 67,000?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I said 6,700.

Mr. LESSLER. These beneficiaries must be over 80 years old.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I do not know. I know we have a number of pensioners of the war of 1812 and, I think, of the Revolutionary war.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Certainly.

Mr. SNODGRASS. We have been furnished with measures for the increase of pensions of Federal soldiers and other wars occurring prior to that of 1860. Why is it that some provision has not been made for the Mexican soldiers? I know there are several bills pending before that committee, and I want to ask the gentleman if we can not expect within a few days, or at least before Congress adjourns, that the gentleman from that committee will report one of those bills to remove at least the restriction against the Mexican soldiers drawing $15 a month, which is the maximum service dependent pension now granted them by law.

I know several efforts have been made by various members of this House to secure a removal of some of those restrictions against the Mexican soldiers getting that maximum sum of $15 a month. I am satisfied if such a bill was reported it would be passed by this House almost unanimously. I want to ask the gentleman if his committee will not report one of those bills before this session closes?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I can not make any promises as to what that committee will do. According to the statements made, there are only a few of those people remaining whom the gentleman seeks to benefit. But I can say to him that a large amount of time of that committee has been consumed in this and the previous sessions in considering cases on the line that he has suggested. Most all of our time is taken up in the consideration of claims that come from that section of the country. And so pressed are we with those private matters urged by members that we hardly have time to consider other measures. I believe, however, that the committee will in the very near future take up the matter referred to and give it consideration.

Mr. SNODGRASS. May we not expect it during the life of this session?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. That I can not say, for I have not consulted with the committee in regard to it, and I do not desire to anticipate their action. I can say very frankly that we have arrived at that period of the session when it is very difficult to get the attendance of a quorum of the committee. By unanimous consent of the House I desire to publish the following résumé of service-pension legislation:

Mr. BELLAMY. Has the gentleman or the committee any estimate of the number of troops that were engaged in the various Indian wars?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mentioned in this bill?

Mr. BELLAMY. Yes, sir; and if so, what is the estimate of the annual appropriation that will be necessary to meet the pensions for those wars?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I have made that statement once to the House.

Several MEMBERS. We did not hear it.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. It is in the report.

Mr. CLAYTON. It is very fully given there.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I ask a vote on my motion.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. LOUDENSLAGER to suspend the rules and pass the bill, with the amendments of the committee, the motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I ask unanimous consent that a statement, which I send to the desk, bearing upon the bill just passed, may be published in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement is as follows:

Memoranda to accompany S. 640, extending the benefits of the Indian war service pension act of July 27, 1892.

The proposed legislation, if enacted into law, would simply follow a line of precedents begun after the war of the Revolution. That war covered the period from April 19, 1775, to April 11, 1783, and thirty-five years later, viz, March 18, 1818, what was practically a service-pension act, but with dependent features, was passed as follows:

"That every commissioned officer, noncommissioned officer, musician, and private soldier, and all officers in the hospital department, and medical staff, who served in the war of the Revolution until the end thereof, or for the term of nine months or longer at any period of the war, on the Continental establishment, and every commissioned officer, noncommissioned officer, mariner, or marine, who served at the same time, and for a like term in the naval service of the United States, who is yet a citizen of the United States, and who is or hereafter, by reason of his reduced circumstances in life, shall be in need of assistance from his country for support, and shall have substantiated his claim to a pension, shall receive a pension from the United States; if an officer, of $20 per month during life; if a noncommissioned officer, musician, mariner, marine, or private soldier, of $8 per month during life."

Fourteen years later, viz, June 7, 1832, the same being forty-nine years after the war of the Revolution closed, a purely service-pension act was passed granting pensions to all those who had not been provided for by the foregoing dependent service-pension act, as follows:

"Each of the surviving officers, noncommissioned officers, musicians, soldiers, and Indian spies who shall have served in the Continental Line or State troops, volunteers, or militia at one or more terms a period of two years during the war of the Revolution is authorized to receive the amount of his full pay in said line according to his rank, but not exceeding in any case the pay of a captain in the said line, such pay to commence on the 4th day of March, 1831, and shall continue during his natural life; and any such officer, noncommissioned officer, musician, or private, as aforesaid, who shall have served in the Continental Line, State troops, volunteers, or militia a term or terms in the whole less than the above period, but not less than six months, shall be authorized to receive during his natural life, each according to his term of service, an amount bearing such proportion to the annuity granted to the same rank for the service of two years as his term of service did to the term aforesaid, to commence from the 4th day of March, 1831.

"The officers, noncommissioned officers, mariners, or marines, who served for a like term during the Revolutionary war shall be entitled to the benefits of this act in the same manner as is provided for the officers and soldiers of the army of the Revolution."

By subsequent enactment the benefits of the act of June 7, 1832, were extended to invalid pensioners of the war of the Revolution as an additional allowance to that received for disabilities incurred in the service.

By enactments of 1836 and 1837 the benefits of the foregoing service-pension act of 1832 were extended to the widows of officers and men of the war of the Revolution if they were the wives of such officers and men during the period of their service, and by still later enactments the limitation as to date of marriage was extended, and finally, by act of July 29, 1848, removed entirely.

WAR OF 1812.

The next service-pension act to be passed by Congress related to the war of 1812. The period of that war was from June 18, 1812, to February 17, 1815, and fifty-six years later, viz, February 14, 1871, an act was passed (see sec. 4736, Rev. Stat.) providing that all officers and enlisted men who served sixty days in the Army or Navy of the United States in said war should receive a pension of $8 per month, if not otherwise pensioned at a similar or higher rate, and the provisions of this act were also extended to the widows of those who had died. Subsequently, by an act of March 9, 1878, the period of service necessary to give title was cut down to fourteen days.

MEXICAN WAR.

The Mexican war began April 24, 1846, and ended May 30, 1848, and in a little less than thirty-nine years thereafter the act of January 29, 1887, was passed, granting pensions for sixty days' service in said war. The rating fixed in that act was $8 per month for survivors and widows alike, but subsequently, under an act approved January 5, 1893, the rating was increased to $12 dollars per month for those survivors who were in destitute circumstances and unable to earn a support by manual labor.

WAR OF THE REBELLION.

This war covered the period from April 15, 1861, to May 9, 1865, and twenty-five years later, viz, June 27, 1890, an act was passed similar in its provisons to the Revolutionary dependent service-pension act of March 18, 1818, above referred to. The act of June 27, 1890, provided that honorable service for ninety days or more in the war of the rebellion should entitle a survivor to a pension, if disabled from causes not due to vicious habits, the pension to be rated from a minimum of six to a maximum of twelve dollars per month, according to the degree of disability, and widows were granted $8 per month, if in dependent circumstances and married the deceased soldier or sailor prior to the passage of the act.

INDIAN WARS FROM 1832 TO 1842, INCLUSIVE.

By an act of July 27, 1892, thirty days of honorable service in the Black Hawk war, the Creek war, the Cherokee disturbances, and the Florida war with the Seminole Indians, embracing the period from 1832 to 1842, inclusive, entitled a survivor to a pension of $8 per month and the same rate to the widows of those who had died, and the proposition contained in this bill is to extend the benefits of this act to all recognized Indian wars in which the United States was engaged prior to the civil war; and as the last of these wars occurred in 1856, the period of time since they closed is now about forty-six years.

STATE, TERRITORIAL, AND PROVISIONAL TROOPS.

In respect of the classes of soldiers to be benefited there is a departure in this bill from the usual provisions contained in recent service-pension laws in that, in addition to those beneficiaries who served for thirty days or more in the service of the United States, those who served under State, Territorial, or provisional authorities are provided for. This feature of the act is safeguarded, however, by the proviso that where there is no record of enlistment or muster into service of the United States in any of the wars mentioned in the act, the recognition of the service by the United States by the payment by the National Government for the service rendered shall be accepted.

This provision is made because many of the veterans benefited by the bill, particularly those of Washington and Oregon, were emergency men, and were called into the service as the exigency arose, there frequently not being time, with the slow and meager methods of communication of those times, for a United States mustering officer to reach the locality where hostilities were under way, and the conditions were entirely different from any now likely to arise in any part of the country. It is argued, and with good reason, that the recognition of the services of these veterans by the Government in paying for their services is a sufficient recognition of the fact that they were in the service of the United States, and, as stated above, the act provides a safeguard against the possibility of granting pensions to purely State militiamen, whose services are not a matter of governmental record and were not recognized by the Government with pay.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I ask unanimous consent that all members desiring the privilege may have permission to print remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed.

A MEMBER. For how many days?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. For five days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Objection was made.

MONUMENT TO GEN. HUGH MERCER.

Mr. WOOTEN. I move to suspend the rules and pass, with the amendment reported by the Committee on the Library, the bill (H. R. 10933) to provide for the erection, at Fredericksburg, Va., of the monumant to the memory of Gen. Hugh Mercer, which it was ordered by Congress on the 8th day of April, 1777, should be erected.

The bill as amended by the Committee on the Library was read, as follows:

Whereas the Congress of the United States, on the 8th day of April, 1777, agreed to the erection of a monument to the memory of Gen. Hugh Mercer, at Fredericksburg, in the State of Virginia, and prescribed an inscription to be placed thereon; and

Whereas up to this time nothing has been done toward carrying into effect the action then taken: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $25,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the erection, at Fredericksburg, in the State of Virginia, of a monument to the memory of Gen. Hugh Mercer, upon which shall be inscribed these words: "Sacred to the memory of Hugh Mercer, brigadier-general in the Army of the United States. He died on the 12th of January, 1777, of the wounds he received on the 3d of the same month, near Princeton, in New Jersey, bravely defending the liberties of America. The Congress of the United States, in testimony of his virtue and their gratitude, have caused this monument to be erected;" which said sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, or such officer as he may designate, and in such sums as the work may require from time to time: Provided, That the city of Fredericksburg, or the citizens thereof, shall cede and convey to the United States such suitable site as may, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, be required for said monument.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. WOOTEN, it was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof); and the bill, with the amendment reported by the Committee on the Library, was passed.

TRANSPORTATION OF GOVERNMENT SUPPLIES TO THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass, with the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, the bill (H. R. 14441) to authorize the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to favor American-built ships in the transportion of Government supplies to the Philippines across the Pacific Ocean.

The bill as amended was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized, in his discretion, to accept the lowest and most suitable bid offered, after inviting competition as required by law, for transporting Government supplies, when necessary, across the Pacific Ocean to and from the Philippines in American-built ships when ships owned by the Government are not available: Provided, That such bid does not exceed by 10 per cent the lowest bid offered for transporting such supplies in foreign-built ships.

Mr. CLAYTON. I demand a second.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Several members objected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] will take their place as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 77, noes none.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER (having counted the House). There are 129 members present—not a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move that the House adjourn.

The question being taken, there were on a division (called for by Mr. UNDERWOOD)—ayes 41, noes 81.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 19 voting in favor thereof.

So the motion to adjourn was rejected.

The SPEAKER. There being no quorum present, the Doorkeeper will close the doors and the Sergeant-at-Arms will bring in absent members to answer to their names. The question is on seconding the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the rule requires that the seconding of a motion to suspend the rules must be by tellers. There is no provision in the rule for calling yeas and nays on seconding a motion to suspend the rules. On the contrary, the rule expressly provides that the vote shall be taken by tellers.

Now, it seems to me the Chair can only count by tellers to ascertain whether the House will second the motion to suspend the rules. I do not know where the authority comes from to call the yeas and nays on such a question.

The SPEAKER. Tellers were duly ordered in this case. The Chair admits that the question raised by the gentleman from Tennessee is not without difficulty. But a rule of the House requires that when a quorum fails to appear the doors shall be closed and members brought in. On another occasion the Chair held that that rule would apply in a case of this kind. Therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 106, nays 66, answered "present" 12, not voting 167; as follows:

So a second was ordered.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

For the day:

Mr. JENKINS with Mr. DE GRAFFENREID.

Mr. OTJEN with Mr. HENRY of Mississippi.

Mr. HEMENWAY with Mr. WHITE.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present adoption of the following resolution, which I will send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the Clerk will report the resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the resolution being read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That at 5 o'clock p. m. Tuesday, June 17, and Wednesday, June 18, the House take a recess until 8 o'clock p. m. and then remain in session not later than 10.30 o'clock p. m., at which sessions it shall be in order to consider bills reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, and no other business shall be in order during such sessions.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, that will conflict with other business. Any request for a night session to consider nothing but Indian bills would conflict with another matter. I understand there will be a night session for debate on the Philippine bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. This does not interfere with that. This is before that takes effect.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I have no objection.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama demands the regular order. A second having been ordered, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS].

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, this bill hardly merits the importance given to it by the gentleman on the other side of the House. It provides, in substance, that the supplies of the War Department may be, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, transported from the United States to the Philippine Islands in vessels built in this country, after the Government shall have exhausted its supply of available ships belonging to it. The bill provides that the Government shall first use all of its available transport service for carrying supplies of the War Department to the Philippines; that after that the Secretary, in his discretion, may use vessels built in this country, providing the rates for such service shall not exceed 10 per cent above the amount that is charged by foreign vessels for similar service.

Under the provisions of the statute passed by this Congress in March of this year, the navigation laws of this country will be extended to the Philippines on the 1st day of July, 1904. After that date all navigation between the United States and the Philippines must be in American vessels, so that at the most this bill would be available but two years. There is always a certain amount of Government supplies that must be transported in private vessels. Much of the supplies—in fact, the great bulk of the supplies—is carried in Government transports, but for reasons of safety the War Department has found it necessary to carry supplies, like munitions of war, hay, forage, and supplies of that sort, in private vessels, on account of danger to life that there would be if they were carried in troop transports, so that there is always a small amount of tonnage necessary to carry these supplies to the Philippines.

The statement before the Committee on Military Affairs was to the effect that next year the War Department estimated that about 70,000 tons will be carried in private vessels. Heretofore quite a large amount has been carried in private vessels. After this most of the supplies will be carried in Government vessels. There are 14 transports now available, and probably 70 per cent of the great bulk of supplies will be carried in these transports; but this small amount, probably about 70,000 tons, must be carried in private vessels. The Quartermaster-General reports that at present freight rates are available on the Pacific at $4.50 a ton, from Puget Sound to the Philippines. If this 10 per cent additional be necessary, which may not be necessary to use as a discrimination in favor of American vessels in case there be competition of American ships, there would then be a maximum of about 50 cents per ton discrimination on about 70,000 tons a year for two years.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Is it not true that the Quartermaster-General declined to recommend the passage of this bill?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. He did not make any recommendation one way or the other.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Did he not in writing decline to recommend it?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The Quartermaster-General in his report stated specifically that he declined to make any recommendation because it was a matter of public policy not in his province, but the Secretary of War strongly recommended the passage of the bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. Is the passage of this bill necessary in order to increase the efficiency of the public service?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; I think it is. I was just coming to that.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will you explain how it is that a proposition simply to give American ships 10 per cent more for doing the same service than foreign-built ships would receive can increase the efficiency of the public service?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I shall be very glad to explain that if the gentleman will give me my own time. The reasons why this bill will increase the facilities, it seems to me, are as follows: Within the last year there have been quite a number of ships constructed in this country that are available for service between the Pacific coast and the Philippines. At the present time there is no regular line of communication by private vessels between the Pacific coast and the Philippines. There are two or three lines which have informed the committee that with this slight encouragement they would start direct lines of communication between the United States and the Philippines, preparing for the extension of our navigation laws two years hence. After that time there will certainly be these direct lines.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I ask the gentleman——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Just one moment more. In the meantime, during these two years, these gentlemen are willing to take their chances and send their ships directly from the United States to the Philippines, providing they have some encouragement like this. There will be a probable loss, but it will give direct service for passengers and mails and freight, and direct service is always an advantage to the Government as well as to private interests.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I ask the gentleman a question now?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. Is not this, then, after all your explanation, simply a homeopathic dose of the ship subsidy?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Now, I will answer that. As the gentleman knows, I am not in favor of the bill before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, but I am in favor of this bill because we know it certainly will accomplish something, and it directly causes the establishment of from one to three lines of communication between the United States and the Philippines right away, and gives this Government an opportunity to send its freights, passengers, and mails more quickly and more cheaply than would otherwise be the case. It may or may not cost the Government anything, because the competition of the several lines will furnish a supply of steam and sailing vessels adequate to supply all the necessities of the Government.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] who addressed the Chair?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I would like to yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask my friend if this is not directly in the interest of one steamship line, the boats of which are now being built?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I would say that I do not think it is. There are at least three lines which have informed us that they can have ships available for this service; and I will state that much of the freight that would be sent under the provisions of this act would be sent by sailing vessels. I refer to such freight as forage and lumber and heavy material of that kind, which would not use steamship lines at all.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Were you not told that it was for the benefit of certain American lines to operate between Seattle and the Philippines and the Orient?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The committee was informed——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Now, if that is true, does the gentleman believe that these people are going to abandon the project of running a line of steamers across the Pacific if this bill should fail to pass?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will answer the gentleman frankly. There were two large steamships built in Baltimore recently. One has already been completed and the other is not yet launched, as I understand. These ships were designed as tramp steamers. A concern known as the Boston Steamship Company conceived the idea of an Asiatic line from Puget Sound, and either hired or purchased or acquired these vessels, and propose to start a line. Whether or not it will be extended to the Philippines depends on whether or not it will be profitable.

Part of the consideration for the starting of these lines will depend on whether they can get any considerable amount of Government business. Now, it seemed to the Committee on Military Affairs and to the Committee on the Merchant Marine that it would be a benefit to this country, that it would be a benefit to the Government service, to have that line from Puget Sound, to have another line from San Francisco, and to have another line from New York directly to the Philippines; and they all three will probably be started with encouragement like this.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then, I understand from all of your statements that foreign-built ships can now be had to carry this hay and lumber that you speak of—notwithstanding the enterprise of of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hull] in the lumber business over there—that ships can be had there that will carry this freight that you speak of without giving this extra 10 per cent to American ships?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. There are always some ships available for business in every part of the world, but I will state to the gentleman that if this bill is passed the amount of discrimination provided in this bill may or may not be required. Not a cent of it may be required under the circumstances if sufficient competition be had, and from reports of the Quartermaster-General and Commissioner of Navigation such supply of vessels will be available. On the other hand, it may be possible that this 10 per cent in the maximum may be required.

Mr. CLAYTON. I hope the gentleman will be entirely frank, as he seems to be.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think I have been.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then the proposition would be to pay American ships 10 per cent more for the same service than we could get foreign ships to do that service for.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I am frank to say I am willing if necessary——

Mr. CLAYTON. I am not discussing that. I am simply stating a question of fact.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Let me complete my answer to the gentleman. I am willing, if necessary for the purpose of establishing a direct line of communication between our country and the Philippines, during the next two years, to pay an additional 10 per cent. It may or may not be necessary after that. The gentleman should know that a line of communication between the United States and the Philippine Islands must be established; that foreign vessels could not afford it, since they could continue in business only two years, and that precludes any direct service except under our flag, and it strikes the committee, under the circumstances, that it would be an advantage to have this line commence right now, and we can well afford, if necessary, to give $35,000 this year for that purpose.

Mr. CLAYTON. And this is a proposition to pay $35,000 for the privilege of letting it go in American ships.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. At the maximum. It may not cost a cent. It may cost $35,000 a year for two years.

Mr. CLAYTON. Do you not think that it would be better to save that $35,000 for the taxpayers rather than give it to the shipowners?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. My impression is if we could have our ships employed between the United States and the Philippine Islands for the purpose of carrying our mail, passengers, and freight it is well worth $35,000 a year.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. COCHRAN. Would not the passage of this bill serve notice on the foreign shipowners that in competition with the American ship henceforth they must expect to have 10 per cent added on the bid made by the American ships?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I do not think it would make any difference with the bids of any foreign ships; whenever it would pay the foreign ships would do the business, if their bids be 11 per cent less than bids of American ships.

Mr. COCHRAN. Does not the gentleman think the American ship would get the 10 per cent more in the bidding?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think this would be the effect: The foreign ships only would bid that much less, and we would get our freight at that much less rate; so that in the end it would not cost the Government one single cent more, and possibly less, by the passage of this act.

Mr. COCHRAN. Would not they retire the foreign ships?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Not at all. It would just have the contrary effect of reducing freight. The quantity of ships, domestic and foreign, is ample for all sorts of competition.

Mr. COCHRAN. Then this is to get reduced rates instead of increasing them.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. BROMWELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota how this proposed subsidy—because that is what it amounts to—is compared to the ship-subsidy bill.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, this hardly amounts to the dignity of a name. It appears from a communication received from the Quartermaster-General that he can get freight at $4.50 a ton. Ten per cent of that would be 45 cents a ton.

Mr. BROMWELL. How does that compare with the ship-subsidy bill?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It might average about 10 per cent.

Mr. BROMWELL. Then would it not be better for these people to wait until we pass the ship-subsidy bill and give them the benefit of the ship subsidy?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. They would be perfectly willing to take whatever assistance they can get out of this bill and at once commence their direct service.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I would like to ask the gentleman whether these ships are to be manned by American labor.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly; under an American register the warrant officers must all be American citizens.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. How about the seamen? That was the point of my inquiry.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. There is no law providing as to them unless they come in under the term "officers."

Mr. COCHRAN. Then, in fact, the seamen will be Chinamen.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I desire to reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire to be recognized in his own right?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do. I yield now to the gentleman from Texas five minutes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, it is very unpleasant to me to see so good a man as the gentleman from Minnesota supporting so vicious a bill. The only merit of this proposition is the fact that the gentleman from Minnesota is supporting it. It is nothing but another form of the ship-subsidy bill. It is a plain, frank proposition to take money out of the Treasury of the United States and vote it into the treasure box of private shipowners.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the citizens of this country doing business. I am opposed to the theory of having the Government doing business that its citizens can do. I am as much opposed to the Government conducting a shipping business as to the Government conducting the business of laying cables and owning telegraph lines.

As soon as it can be done in the interest of economy and not impair the efficiency of the service I shall favor the sale of all Government transports and favor reliance upon private shipping for the transportation of military stores.

I would give the citizens all the freedom possible in the development of commercial enterprises. But I am not in favor and I can not support any measure which undertakes to do in a single instance what the majority of this Congress has not the courage to do wholesale. The ship-subsidy bill has not been brought in here for consideration in this House and probably will not be brought in, but this is exactly the same principle, a direct application to a few individual owners of the theory of the Hanna-Payne bill.

Now, this bill provides:

That the Secretary of War is authorized, in his discretion, to accept the lowest and most suitable bid offered, after inviting competition as required by law, for transporting Government supplies, when necessary, across the Pacific Ocean to and from the Philippines in American-built ships when ships owned by the Government are not available.

Now, without desiring to cast any reflection at all upon the Secretary of War or the officials of the War Department, with all of whom my relations are pleasant and cordial and for whom I have the most profound respect, I desire to say that in my judgment this leaves with these gentlemen a dangerous power. Somebody will be called upon to pass upon the question of availability, and I apprehend that when there is a powerful corporation, able to contribute and perhaps willing to contribute to the campaign fund, able and willing to promote the interests of any Administration, I do not care what it may be or who are its officers, the officers who are to determine the question of availability will not have so clear a vision of what constitutes availability as they might have.

This is admitted to be for the interests of lines already established or lines for which steamers are now being constructed, and I can not persuade myself that any corporation now operating steamships or owning steamships plying the Pacific Ocean will abandon them if this bill fails to pass. I believe it is an unjust and improper tax, and I believe it should not and can not pass this House.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary to make any long argument for or against this bill, but a simple statement of the facts puts the whole matter before the House, so that those who favor it and those who oppose it can readily understand the measure. It is represented that in certain cases the Government requires the services of vessels belonging to private persons for transporting certain provisions and supplies, such as hay and the like to the Philippine Islands, the Government transports not being suitable or not being wholly adequate for that purpose.

That is one fact. The next fact is that the extra vessels required for this service can be had under existing law at reasonable rates and without the passage of this bill. I believe the report shows what that rate is and will continue to be. The other material fact in this case is that after bids shall have been received by the Secretary of War from the owners of these private vessels for the performance of this extra service—that is, service that it is impossible or inexpedient for the Government transports to perform—then the Secretary of War is authorized not merely to give the preference in awarding the contract to the American-built vessels, but he is authorized to pay them 10 per cent more for the same service than foreign-built vessels shall have bid.

Ten per cent more than the American vessel, perhaps, is paid now for doing that work. I have stated the proposition. You can not differentiate it from a bounty or subsidy. Your can not differentiate it from a gratuity to an American vessel for doing the same work that can now be done, and that can be done in the future, without the payment of this extra 10 per cent.

The gentleman said this prepares the way for an American line. Mr. Speaker, this prepares the way for the ship-subsidy bill. It is a ship-subsidy bill. This is the beginning of ship subsidies. This is the first bill on that line, and any man who votes for this proposition might as well, in my judgment, go the whole way and vote for the Hanna-Payne ship-subsidy bill when it comes before this House.

The principle underlying them is the same, and the one can not be distinguished in principle from the other. I hope that gentlemen on this side who believe in paying out the public money for public purposes only and not for the enhancement of private enterprises will vote down this proposition. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that this is a homeopathic dose of ship subsidy. Let the $35,000 per annum, with probable increase, be saved to the people's Treasury. I now yield five minutes to my colleague, Mr. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I see from the report of the committee that in the fiscal year 1901 there was transported from the United States to the Philippine Islands in United States Government vessels 80,000 tons, in United States private vessels 27,000 tons, and in foreign vessels 192,000 tons.

Now, in 1901 we paid for transporting the freight to the Philippine Islands $3,570,447 to foreign vessels. That to private vessels of the United States we paid $1,350,000. Now, I do not know how much more freight is to be carried next year than was carried last year, or how much less freight; but if this bill had applied to the transportation of goods from this country to the Philippine Islands for the year 1901, and by this means we had foreign vessels out of competition, or had simply let them carry the freight they carried at that time and saved the 10 per cent additional to private vessels of the United States instead of the amount of $34,000, as suggested by the gentleman in charge of this bill, the private vessels of the United States would have received under this bill for that year $100,000 more for the freight they carried than they actually received; because it is needless to say that when you have had foreign vessels actually carrying at least two-thirds of the trade and American vessels carrying only one-third, competition in the years past has regulated the freight rate, and that is the basis on which the freight is being carried to-day. But whenever you say that 10 per cent more shall be received by American vessels than by foreign vessels, then as to that proportion of the freight the American ship is carrying it will receive the additional 10 per cent, because every shipowner knows the profit at which he can afford to carry freight and at which his rival can afford it, and necessarily if he is to receive a bonus so far as concerns the freight he can carry he will bid 9 or nearly 10 per cent more than he thinks his competitor can carry for, and then the competitor will have only the surplus freight.

That is all there is in this matter. This is not a bill to provide ships for carrying this material, because during the height of the late war, when we were rushing troops to the front, when we demanded every ship that we could get to carry our supplies and troops, we got them. The exigencies of the occasion do not require more vessels to-day than they did then.

What, then, is the result? The only result is that you propose by this legislation to say that you will pay the shipowner for carrying freight to the Philippine Islands 10 per cent more next year than you paid last year.

Why should you do so? Is there any good reason why the American shipowner should receive more for carrying freight next year than he did last year? He carried it last year; he competed last year with the foreign ships; and he carried so much of our merchandise to the Philippine Islands as the profit of the trade justified him in carrying. Of course he will carry next year, if you leave the situation alone, just such amount of the freight as the profit of the business will justify him in carrying, and no more.

Now, if this is a bill to build up shipping on the Pacific coast, why does not the gentleman from Minnesota say so? But you can not build up shipping in a day. If that is the purpose, is this measure going to stay on the statute books for all time? It seems so from the way the bill is drafted. From now until the dawn of eternity are we to go on paying to American shipowners 10 per cent more than the amount they would receive in the natural and orderly course of business? There is no reason for it. Those ships are thriving or they would not be in business; and if the business justifies it there will be other ships built to continue and take up this business. If the business does not justify it——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Nine minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SNODGRASS].

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Speaker, of course two minutes are altogether inadequate for the expression of my opinions upon this bill. I believe it is a ship-subsidy bill on a small scale. If we can pass a bill of this kind, I do not think there is any limitation whatever upon the expenditure of the public money. This is a proposition simply to take money derived from taxation of the whole people and bestow it as a gratuity upon a certain shipping class. If that can be done, there is no limitation upon the expenditure of the public money at all. That is all I have to say about the question. I shall take great pleasure in voting against this bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, not one of us but has considered the vast sum paid by our people to foreign shipowners and the figure this item cuts in the balance of trade between the United States and the Old World. Mere casual consideration of these figures must lead to the conclusion that American ownership of ships is far more important than the country in which ships may be constructed.

To have our shipping owned in the United States, so that all the profit growing out of the traffic between our country and other countries would inure to Americans, would have a tendency to rectify the adverse balance of trade which, first and last, has been quite inconvenient.

I suppose, also, we have heard all the argument made—and it has great force—that with a large merchant marine, we would have constantly in training the seamen necessary to meet any emergency in manning our war ships. Nobody can deny that this argument has great force. Nothing in any plan to subsidize ships, thus far brought forward, has had any reference to either of these propositions. At this time, when the Congress has under consideration a bill to subsidize American ships, that prince of the household of the "captains of industry," J. Pierpont Morgan, is spending most of his time in Europe for the purpose of effecting a consolidation of shipping interests, foreign and domestic, so that foreign capitalists may participate in the benefits of such a measure.

Whenever the question arises in such a way as to affect labor—American labor—objection is made. We find gentlemen on this floor insisting that there must be no prohibition of the employment of Chinamen as seamen on our commercial vessels. So that neither American labor nor American capital is considered by the authors of these subsidy bills.

You can not name a single syllable in this bill which would prevent foreigners—a London corporation with an American directory of five or six people—from owning every ship that is to sail between our ports and the Philippine Islands. It is altogether certain, taking the history of our great railroad system as a criterion, if we shall subsidize our ships and make them sufficiently profitable, a favorite on the London Stock Exchange will be "American shipping bonds," "American shipping stocks," and probably a greater amount of these securities will be held abroad than in the United States. Thus the profits of the shipping we are to build up with subsidies will continue to go to foreigners.

There is absolutely nothing in any of these measures having any object except to enable the international money syndicate, the stock jobbers of the capitals of this country and foreign countries, to reach into the Treasury of the United States and take money out that they have not earned. The real cause of the financial cataclysms and disasters which have afflicted this generation is the partnership existing between London, New York, and Boston during the building of the transcontinental lines. Some would tell you these lines were built with foreign capital. I deny it. None of the great arterial roads of this country were built with foreign capital. They were built with domestic bonds, domestic subsidies, and after they were built they were consolidated by international stock jobbers, who straightway loaded them down with watered securities.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has four minutes remaining.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I object to this bill for two reasons, each one of them fundamental in its character, in my opinion. First, I believe that it is the duty of the Government always, and in this case as much as in any other, to procure the performance of public service at the least possible expense to the public Treasury, and therefore at the least possible cost to the taxpayers, who keep the public Treasury replete with money. My second objection grows out of what was said by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS]. He told us that if this bill were passed it would result in the creation and operation of two or three shipping lines from ports of the United States to the Philippine Islands. If that is true, Mr. Speaker, then the effect of this bill would be to create just that much more vested interest, dependent for its prosperity, if not for its very life, upon the permanent retention of the Philippine Islands.

I am very desirous of seeing the American people left free to consider and pass upon the great and vital question as to whether we shall or shall not permanently retain the Philippine Islands as a part of American territory, free as far as possible from financial, corporate, and other influences. I am very desirous to see us do nothing which shall result in creating great vested interests, which shall render it more and more difficult every day for us to cut loose from Asiatic territory and from oriential populations. It seems to me that that is the vital objection to this bill, because if we do pass it and if these lines are created we have called into being just one more interest to confuse and to corrupt the jury which is to pass upon this question, namely, the American voter—to bribe, in other words, a part of the jury by making it to their personal interest, whether it is to the public and national interest and interest of the perpetuity of our institutions or not, to remain permanently in control of the Philippine Islands. That is all I wanted to say, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Six minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, this is certainly a very small bill to create such a furor. It is a bill of considerable importance, however. I do not care to say very much about it, because I realize that under the rule if our Democratic friends vote solidly against the bill, even though the Republican members vote solidly for it, the bill will fail, since it requires a two-thirds vote for its passage under the rules as we are now acting.

It seems to me that the figures cited in this report and the figures read by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] would show us that some good should result from this bill, and that our pride as Americans should lead us even to sacrifice a little, even a few dollars, in order to secure the carrying of American supplies, especially of Government supplies, in American vessels. Last year, as he read, we paid to the owners of foreign-built ships over $3,500,000 for the carrying of Government supplies. The year before we paid over $3,000,000 also. We paid to the owners of the vessels built in our own yards only a little over $1,000,000.

Now, I want to say to the members of this House that so far as I am concerned I would be willing to pay the 10 per cent, even in my own private business, in favor of American industries, in favor of the products of American labor, in favor of the encouragement of American producers, in preference to foreign labor and foreign products, and I believe that the Government could well afford to pay even 10 per cent, if it were necessary, in the carrying of its own supplies in the vessels of its own citizens, thereby encouraging its own labor and its own capital to that extent. But it does not follow that under this bill the Government would pay 10 per cent more. American vessels are competing in bids with foreign-built ships, and if the American vessel comes within 1 per cent of the bid of the foreign-built ship, as it now is, the Secretary of War has no discretion.

He must award the contract to the foreign-built ship; but under this bill, if an American vessel bids within 1 per cent, then he has discretion to allow the home vessel to carry the goods. Should he not have such discretion? It seems to me that every loyal American citizen and everyone who desires to see our own industries prosper—to see our goods transported under the American flag—would be willing to pay 1 per cent, 2 per cent, 5 per cent, or even 10 per cent more in order to secure this business for our own people, and that is all that this bill does. If they do not bid within 10 per cent, then it goes to the foreign-built ships. If they bid within 10, 7, 5, 3, or 1 per cent, then they get the contract, and they ought to have it.

The gentleman from Tennessee asks whether the Quartermaster-General recommended this bill or not. He does not in this report, but I violate no confidence when I say that the Quartermaster-General personally is heartily in favor of this proposition, and the Secretary of War says he "warmly approves" it. As the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] has said, this bill may mean the spending of a small additional sum by the Government, and it may mean the expenditure of not one cent additional. The benefits accruing from it will far exceed the outlay. There is a scarcity of American ships on the Pacific now. There are many building that with the least encouragement will go into the trade. With the Government supplies to transport and with the other business that will come they can make regular sailings to and from the Philippines and the Pacific coast. Even if the Government should pay a little more, the increased competition will lower freight rates to our own citizens. This is a benefit that should not be overlooked.

This bill affects the entire Pacific coast alike. No one city has an advantage over another by reason of the terms of this bill. If any line is contemplated by reason of the going into effect of our navigation laws in 1904 this bill will hasten this rather than retard. If any city has not the ships I am sure it would rather the trade should be done in our own ships than by those of foreigners. The simple proposition seems to me to be "Do we prefer our own Government to transport its own supplies under a foreign flag and in foreign ships, thereby employing foreign labor and capital, rather than in our own ships, under our own flag, and employing our own capital and labor, even if it costs a few cents more?" You may vote for the foreign ship; I will vote for the American ship, and I have no fears of the verdict of the American people on such a proposition. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, just one suggestion. As the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES] said, this bill does not amount to much. The Army has been reduced from forty-five or forty-six thousand men in the Philippines to twenty thousand next year.

Mr. HULL. Reduced from 62,000 men.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. As the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee corrects me, the Army has been reduced from 62,000 men in the Philippines down to 20,000 next year. The supply of horses has already been mainly transported. The Department last year has finished a large freight ship, the Samoa, so that nearly all the freight will go by the Government lines.

The freights have been reduced from $7.39 per ton last year to about $4.50 per ton at the present time; so that all it will amount to during the next year will be, as I said, about 70,000 tons, according to the best estimate that can be made, and a discrimination may be allowed of about 50 cents a ton. Now, this small additional amount may or may not be necessary, according to the conditions of competition. Not 1 cent may be necessary, but if it is necessary, and if it results in starting one line or two lines or three lines to the Philippines—whether those islands are to remain with us permanently or not is not the question—if it results in starting one line or two lines or three lines to the Philippines, it seems to me that this money will be well expended. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The gentleman says most of the freight will be carried by Government vessels.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Do you know whether it is the policy of the War Department to sell the transports or not?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No, sir; not a word has been said on that subject.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I notice that two vessels—the Buford and the Grant—have been advertised for sale.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Nothing has been said before the committee on that subject.

Mr. SHAFROTH. You do not know anything about the policy of the Government on that subject?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The policy of the Government for the next year, at least, will be to retain all the vessels that can be used for the Government business.

Mr. CLAYTON. You say this bill authorizes the payment of this extra 10 per cent if necessary. I should like to know of the gentleman if he ever knew of a case where anybody was authorized to draw a cent out of the Treasury that the money was not drawn out?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; I know of a great many cases, and this may be one of them.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question being taken,

The SPEAKER said: In the opinion of the Chair, the bill has failed to receive a two-thirds affirmative vote.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 78, noes 66.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill was lost.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield to my colleague.

BILLS FROM COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which I handed up a moment ago.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That at 5 o'clock p. m. on Tuesday, June 17, and Wednesday, June 18, the House take a recess until 8 o'clock p. m., and then remain in session not later than 10.30 o'clock p. m., at which sessions it shall be in order to consider bills reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, and no other business shall be in order during such sessions.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman will modify that motion so that we can complete the deficiency bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am willing to accept any suitable suggestion.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman understands that we have only Wednesday for the deficiency bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Say we do not say the recess shall be taken at 5 o'clock.

Mr. PAYNE. Make it not to interfere with appropriation bills.

Mr. CANNON. I would rather not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am entirely willing that the gentleman may fix it that the House take a recess at some time. Will you fix the time?

Mr. CANNON. I do not want gentlemen to suppose that we are within an hour of adjournment.

Mr. PAYNE. Suppose he says it shall not interfere with the consideration of appropriation bills.

Mr. SHERMAN. When the House is ready to adjourn, it will take a recess, and there shall be a session from 8 o'clock.

Mr. PAYNE. Make it this way: "Provided, That this order shall not interfere with the consideration of general appropriation bills."

Mr. SHERMAN. That is entirely satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman modifies his resolution so that it will read as follows:

Resolved, That at 5 o'clock on Tuesday, June 17, and Wednesday, June 18, the House shall take a recess until 8 o'clock p. m., and then remain in session not later than 10.30 o'clock p. m., at which sessions it shall be in order to consider bills reported from Committee on Indian Affairs, and no other business shall be in order during such sessions: Provided, That this order shall not interfere with the consideration of general appropriation bills.

Mr. CANNON. That does not make it any better. Then we would have to take a recess at 5 o'clock.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That forces the recess at 5 o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want to modify that suggestion—that the House take a recess until 6 o'clock.

Mr. CANNON. But suppose we want to go beyond 6 o'clock.

Mr. PAYNE. Let it be that on the second day the House shall take a recess after the completion of the appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will modify the resolution so as to strike out the entire question of the hour of taking a recess and provide that there shall be a session from 8 o'clock until 10.30 for the purpose of considering bills reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CANNON. Not to interfere with appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman will be permitted to make the following change in his motion, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on Tuesday, June 17, and Wednesday, June 18, the House shall hold evening sessions, beginning at 8 o'clock p. m. and remaining in session not later than 10.30 o'clock p. m., at which sessions it shall be in order to consider bills reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, and no other business shall be in order during such sessions.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CANNON. Just for the sake of asking a question, I demand a second, and ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands a second, and asks unanimous consent that the second may be considered as ordered.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask the gentleman from New York what is the nature of the business to be brought up?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, the business of greatest importance is the Creek and Cherokee treaties, the failure of the ratification of which at this session would very materially delay the completion of the work of the Dawes Commission. There are some other treaty bills and some other minor legislative matters, some involving appropriations and some of them that do not. But the gentleman realizes that in an evening session of that kind it will practically require unanimous consent to pass anything, so that I think there is no possible danger of the Treasury being looted or obnoxious and vicious legislation being enacted.

Mr. CANNON. I think that in the matter of the ratification of treaties with the Indians there ought to be a full House, and not tired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I would like to ask the gentleman whether these treaties to be considered include the treaty with the Mississippi Choctaws?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Would it not be well to let these bills be considered in Committee of the Whole at night, and then be called up for consideration in the House?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I think this is an order which everybody understands in effect means that we can only pass such legislation as would pass by a unanimous vote. We can not hope to have a quorum. When we pass this resolution all gentlemen realize that there will not be a quorum, and anybody can prevent any legislation they desire—any single individual. There can be no doubt about that.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the resolution.

The question was taken; and (in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the resolution was passed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

S. 1792. An act to amend an act entitled "An act relating to navigation of vessels, bills of lading, and to certain obligations, duties, and rights in connection with the carriage of property"—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Robert R. Veitch, administrator of estate of Septimus Brown, against the United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LODGE. I present a memorial of a committee appointed at a recently held meeting of persons, irrespective of party, interested in the policy pursued by the United States toward the Philippine Islands and the inhabitants thereof, and also the condition of affairs in those islands. I ask that the memorial be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on the Philippines, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The honorable the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned would respectfully represent that they are a committee appointed at a recently held meeting of persons, irrespective of party, interested in the policy pursued by the United States toward the Philippine Islands and the inhabitants thereof. As such they were instructed to investigate the condition of affairs connected therewith, and take such subsequent action as might seem expedient. Having, to a certain extent, performed this duty they now submit the following

MEMORIAL.

It is not our present purpose to discuss any controverted questions connected with events which have recently taken place in the Philippine Islands, or to call in question the policy which either has been pursued by the United States or which it is proposed to pursue in regard to these islands or the inhabitants thereof. In the performance of the duties imposed upon us these matters have to a greater or less extent engaged our attention, and the results at which we arrive may not improbably be brought to your notice at some future time. Certain facts, however, which seem to us of much import are not open to dispute. To these, and the conclusions to be drawn from them as to us the exigency seems great and immediate, we now respectfully invite your attention.

It is apparent that, as an outcome of the policy and course of action hitherto pursued, which may or may not have met the approval of those we represent, certain things have resulted:

The United States, as a nation, has assumed charge of communities of Asiatic descent, occupying many islands of an archipelago at a great distance from our nearest continental possessions. Those communities, numbering millions, are of a race wholly distinct from ourselves, with other traditions and habits, speaking foreign, and, in many cases, unknown tongues. The acquisition of the Philippine Islands and their inhabitants, while imposing on us treaty obligations, has been followed by prolonged warlike operations marked by acts of fierce resistance, not quickly overcome, on the part of the Filipinos, and by military severities on our part of a character unprecedented in our annals. Those islands are now held by us partly under military law and partly under civil authority, but in absolute subjection. In the course of this mixed administration of affairs no inconsiderable degree of friction has existed, and apparently still does exist, between our military and civil representatives. Such could, indeed, hardly be avoided. In the prosecution of military movements the establishment of camps of concentration for the inhabitants of large districts has been thought expedient; and the people of those districts of both sexes and all ages thus gathered from their homes and usual vocations have therein been compelled to live, with sanitary results concerning which only very indefinite information has been received. In the course of military operations also large regions have been devastated, towns have been burned, and the food supply of the country destroyed. It has hence resulted that when the inhabitants have been returned from the camps of concentration to their former places of abode they have found their shelters gone and the means of subsistence greatly impaired or wholly lacking. It is known that the epidemics usually and, indeed, inevitably, incident to such a state of affairs are now raging in the islands, though only very partial statistics as respects mortality are made public, if, indeed, they are in any wise obtainable. Extensive districts inhabited by our dependents have thus been scourged and are now stricken with war, famine, and pestilence.

For the people thus afflicted, whether excusably or otherwise, America stands responsible. That responsibility can not be evaded. Those people have, moreover, no means of communicating directly with us. Removed by the width of an ocean, they are unable to make their situation known, whether to ask for aid and relief or to obtain redress of grievances, if such exist. They have not been invited, perhaps, not even permitted, to speak unless they seemed to approve of our doings. But they are still our subjugated dependents. To us, and to us only, can they look, and from our decision they have no appeal.

Such being, as we understand, the undisputed facts, we desire, respectfully, to represent that the Congress of the United States, as the supreme lawmaking authority, is of necessity the grand inquest of the American people. It alone possesses the power necessary adequately to deal with a situation such as now exists. The inquiry at present being carried on by one of your honorable bodies has unquestionably been productive of valuable results—results the far-reaching importance of which, both to the people of this country and to the Filipinos, it would, in our judgment, not be easy to exaggerate. But that inquiry has also demonstrated to us—and we think must have satisfied all careful observers of its course—that no inquiry instituted in this country, and carried on under similar limitations, can possibly meet full present requirements.

It is plain that, at best, only odds and ends of evidence, stray scraps of information not always of unquestioned authenticity, are forthcoming or obtainable; the dependent communities are not represented; one side, in a conflict of races, debarred from testifying, remains, and must remain, substantially unheard, where not in a measure dumb. To reach any satisfactory results inquisition must be made on the spot and among the people concerned—the dependents of the United States, our so-called subject races. Under these circumstances did we ourselves, the undersigned, representing an unrecognized constituency and clad with no official authority, undertake to go out to the Philippine Archipelago, or to send there a committee of our number, we would have no power to gather evidence, to elicit facts, or to prescribe remedies. We could at best appear merely as volunteers, and, as such, would probably be ordered at once to return whence we came. It would be altogether otherwise with those coming from the Congress of the United States, and members of it. Its delegates would represent the full dignity, authority, and power of the American people. To them every source of information would be accessible, while their mere presence would vastly improve the situation.

The facts being thus, we respectfully ask, on behalf of ourselves and those we represent, that the Congress of the United States will forthwith provide for the appointment of a committee of investigation of its own number, to proceed at the earliest practicable moment to the Philippine Archipelago, and there enter upon such an investigation as will cause the people of the United States to feel assured that full information is being elicited, that all grievances will be considered, that any measures necessary to the protection and a reestablished prosperity of our dependents will in due time be instituted, and that, in the light of the fullest possible knowledge of facts and conditions, the American people may form their judgment of the policy so far pursued, as well as that to be adopted for the future.

We further desire to point out a full precedent for the appointment of such a joint Congressional committee of inquiry. In the year 1865, at the close of our civil war, when a state of affairs not altogether dissimilar to that in the Philippine Archipelago existed in the so-called Confederate States, cognizance was taken of the fact, and Congress, by a concurrent resolution of December 13, acting as the grand national inquest, appointed such a committee as is now suggested. Composed of six members on the part of the Senate, and nine members on the part of the House of Representatives, William Pitt Fessenden, of Maine, was chairman on behalf of the former, and Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, on behalf of the latter, while among those composing the committee were James W. Grimes, Jacob M. Howard, Reverdy Johnson, E. B. Washburne, Justin F. Morrill, Roscoe Conkling, and George S. Boutwell. The committee thus composed then made, as respects the region which had constituted the so-called Confederacy, an investigation similar in character to that we now ask for as respects the Philippine Archipelago.

We would accordingly petition your honorable bodies that such a joint special committee be now provided, and that it be of sufficient size to command public confidence by containing representatives of both parties and advocates of all different lines of policy, to the end that full information may be elicited and the greatest possible volume of variant light shed upon the duties and obligations which this people have had forced upon them or voluntarily assumed.

We would further respectfully request that this committee be so constituted as to enable it to cover the entire field of investigation within the limited time at its disposal. To make this possible it should be accompanied by a body of experts, military and civil, representing the medical, sanitary, industrial, and other scientific phases involved in the great and complex problem to be considered, and upon which the committee will be called intelligently to pass.

On the spot, and in this way only, we submit, can the American people be properly and fully advised as to the duties and obligations now imposed upon them. As a portion of the people, realizing those obligations and impressed with a not undue sense of the responsibility which has been incurred, we submit this memorial, and ask for it your early and favorable consideration.

I move that the matter be printed as a report coming from the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 6180) for the relief of the estate of Solomon Smith, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McENERY introduced a bill (S. 6181) for the relief of Matilda M. Fairex, administratrix of the estate of Daniel Fairex, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MILLARD introduced a bill (S. 6182) granting an increase of pension to Lila L. Egbert; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6183) granting an increase of pension to Susanna V. Wells; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WELLINGTON introduced a bill (S. 6184) granting a pension to Henry J. Hardy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas introduced a bill (S. 6185) for the relief of Thomas D. Ruffin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FAIRBANKS introduced a bill (S. 6186) granting an increase of pension to John F. Wildman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6187) granting an increase of pension to William H. H. Cain; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TALIAFERRO submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation to pay the Independent Line Steamers, of Tampa, Fla., in full settlement of all claims against the United States for damages to the steamer Manatee from $624.18 to $1,344.18, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bill and joint resolution were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Library:

A bill (H. R. 10933) to provide for the erection, at Fredericksburg, Va., of the monument to the memory of Gen. Hugh Mercer, which it was ordered by Congress on the 8th day of April, 1777, should be erected; and

A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 6) in relation to monument to prison-ship martyrs at Fort Greene, Brooklyn, N. Y.

The bill (H. R. 12141) to amend an act entitled "An act amending section 4708 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to pensions to remarried widows, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ELIZABETH A. TURNER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5856) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth A. Turner, which was in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "sixteen" and insert "twelve."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives and request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. PRITCHARD, and Mr. TALIAFERRO were appointed.

PENSIONS TO SURVIVORS OF INDIAN WARS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 640) to extend the provisions, limitations, and benefits of an act entitled "An act granting pensions to the survivors of the Indian wars of 1832 to 1842, inclusive, known as the Black Hawk war, Creek war, Cherokee disturbances, and the Seminole war," approved July 27, 1892, which were, on page 3, line 2, after the word "into," to insert "the," and after the word "service" to insert "of the United States."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate agree to the amendments made by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

MONUMENT TO ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5269), entitled "An act to provide a commission to secure plans and designs for a monument or memorial to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States," which were, on page 1, line 5, after the word "State," to strike out "and," and in line 6, after the word "War," to insert "and Representative JAMES D. RICHARDSON."

Mr. WETMORE. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives and request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. WETMORE, Mr. HANSBROUGH, and Mr. VEST were appointed.

INCREASED PENSIONS FOR LOSS OF LIMBS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4850) to increase the pensions of those who have lost limbs in the military or naval service of the United States or are totally disabled in the same, which were, on page 1, line 6, after the word "duty," to insert "from wounds, injury, or disease originating prior to August 4, 1886;" in line 8, to strike out "forty-five" and insert "forty;" in line 11, to strike out "fifty" and insert "forty-six;" on page 2, line 1, after the word "joint," to insert "or where the same is in such a condition;" in line 2, to strike out "or are totally disabled in the same;" in line 3, to strike out "sixty" and insert "fifty-five," and in line 6, after the word "month," to insert:

And that all persons who, in like manner, shall have lost both feet shall receive a pension at the rate of $100 per month: Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to reduce any pension under any act, public or private.

SEC. 2. That the pensions of all persons who served one year or more in the Army or Navy of the United States, and who, under the act approved June 27, 1890, and the acts amendatory thereof, are drawing or hereafter shall be entitled to draw a pension at the rate of $12 per month, and who are or shall become so disabled from injuries or disease as to require the frequent and periodical aid and attendance of another person, shall be increased to $30 per month from and after the date of the certificate of the examining surgeon or board of examining surgeons showing such degree of disability and made subsequent to the passage of this act.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this is a bill which passed the Senate a little while ago increasing the pensions of the maimed soldiers of the country. The other House not only amended it in the matter of rates, but has made it apply only to soldiers who received their disabilities prior to the Spanish war. The House has likewise attached an amendment to the bill increasing from $12 to $30 per month the pensions of soldiers under the act of June 30, 1890, who had one year's service and who required the periodical attendance of another person.

I will say, that it may be understood by Senators and by the soldiers of the country, that the amendments destroy the purpose of the bill and that in all human probability no legislation on this subject will be had at the present session of Congress.

I move the reference of the bill and amendments to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

PAYMENTS FROM CUBAN FUNDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. TELLER, as follows:

Whereas it seems impracticable to prepare during this session of Congress an itemized statement showing the collection and disbursement of all funds for the whole period of the military occupation of Cuba; and

Whereas it is important that a statement be now made of the accounts hereafter named: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate the following:

A full itemized statement of all payments made out of Cuban funds to any persons or corporations, if any, for the purpose of promoting "reciprocity" between the United States and Cuba, at any time during the military occupation of Cuba by the United States, and whether such payments were authorized or approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. TELLER. The junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], who asked that the resolution might lie over, is not present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall it lie on the table, subject to the call of the Senator?

Mr. TELLER. Yes; I suppose that is the course he really wanted to have taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the request. The resolution will lie on the table, subject to the call of the Senator from Colorado.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For what purpose does the Senator rise?

Mr. STEWART. To speak on the Nicaragua Canal bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] was recognized last night and is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEWART. I had given notice before.

Mr. PERKINS. The notice of the Senator from Nevada upon the Calendar says 2 o'clock.

Mr. STEWART. No; I said immediately after the morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar shows that the Senator gave notice that at 2 o'clock he would address the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. Very well.

UNITED STATES PRISONERS.

Mr. HOAR. I should like, with the leave of the Senator from California, to have a bill passed to which there will be no objection. It is the bill (H. R. 14411) to regulate the commutation for good conduct for United States prisoners. It has passed the House and was drawn in the Attorney-General's Department. I should like to ask the Senate to put it on its passage. It is a humane bill that ought to be acted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield for that purpose?

Mr. PERKINS. I will yield if the bill does not invite discussion.

Mr. HOAR. If it does I shall withdraw it at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOAR. With the leave of the Senator from California I should like to make one statement about the bill which has just passed.

I received a great many communications from different parts of the country saying that it ought to apply to cases of prisoners sentenced heretofore, and undoubtedly that would be quite desirable, but there was a very serious doubt in the minds of members of the committee of the constitutional power of Congress to pass a bill of that sort which should apply to sentences heretofore imposed. Therefore the committee thought it unwise to include such a provision.

SALARIES OF POST-OFFICE CLERKS.

Mr. MASON. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 4949) to provide for the classification of the salaries of clerks employed in post-offices of the first and second class, simply for the purpose of having an amendment made, and then having the bill reprinted as amended.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MASON. I move to amend, in section 1, on page 2, line 4, by striking out the word "may," before the word "be," and inserting "shall;" so as to read:

Who, at the date of July 1, 1902, shall be receiving a salary less than $1,000 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MASON. I now ask that the bill may be printed as amended, and I give notice that to-morrow morning I shall ask for its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCOMAS in the chair). If there be no objection, an order will be made to reprint the bill as amended.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, the Pacific coast States are especially interested in the construction of an isthmian canal that will connect the waters of the Pacific with those of the Atlantic. For thirty years or more this subject has been uppermost in the minds of the people of the Pacific coast States. They believe the construction of such a canal would place our people and the products of our lands more easily in the markets of the world, thus saving a voyage around Cape Horn of 15,000 miles or a journey across the continent.

The consensus of opinion, I think, has been in favor of the Nicaragua canal. The concessions that have been made by the Nicaraguan Government have been liberal and generous. Those of the Costa Rican Government I never heard questioned until yesterday, when the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE] advanced, to my mind, the first view that under the constitution of the Republic of Costa Rica they were prohibited from making a concession for building a canal through their territory. If that is true, Mr. President, the legal minds of our country have been laboring under an erroneous impression. But be that as it may, the remarks that I propose to make this morning are intended to show the advantages, as I understand them, of the Nicaraguan route over that of any other route that is known. It possibly will be shown that the San Blas or Darien route or the Tehuantepec route or some other route has peculiar natural advantages over any other route when there is a probability of a law being enacted that will enable this Government to acquire jurisdiction to construct a canal.

FEW ADVANTAGES IN THE COLOMBIAN TREATY.

If, as the Senator from South Dakota has stated, the constitution of Nicaragua does not give that country a right to make this concession to the United States, certainly the memorandum of the convention that is proposed between the United States and Colombia, which has been sent to Congress by the Secretary of State, does not give us many advantages in Colombia. While the Senator was delivering his very able speech yesterday I took occasion to look over this protocol or draft of a convention which it is proposed to enter into between these Governments. That between the United States and Nicaragua is clear and forcible; there is no ambiguity in it; it is concise and to the point. It says the Republic of Nicaragua leases in perpetuity for all time to the United States the exclusive right to construct, own, and operate a ship canal through the territory of Nicaragua to connect the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. There are no strings tied to that provision. It is clear and concise and to the point. The provision follows that we are to pay a certain sum of money per annum for this privilege for a certain length of time.

What does this suggested treaty with Colombia propose to do? I looked at it yesterday while the distinguished Senator was making his speech. I view it only as a business man. I venture to say if the Senator were my counsel seeking a franchise in my State for the right to build a turnpike road or to construct a ferry or bridge across a river upon which I might collect the tolls, he would say, "You can not accept any such proposition as there is in this memorandum."

SOME OF THE DISADVANTAGES.

What does it do, Mr. President? It goes on, first, to provide that Colombia shall cease to receive $250,000 per annum for the privileges which we are to inherit of the Panama Railroad Company. It goes on further to state that we shall pay $7,000,000. The conditions under which we shall make the payment are clear; there is not any ambiguity in it, but when it comes to fixing the rates for the privilege of a canal through the State of Colombia it is quite a different story.

It impresses me as a business man, as I gave it a cursory reading yesterday, that there is not a lawyer in the Senate who would advise one to accept a franchise and spend any money under the privilege of that franchise, thinking he had something from a county or State that was of value, because there is no limit for the rate of payment. It simply provides that three years before the expiration of the fourteen years they shall fix a reasonable annuity, and there shall be taken into consideration the present price of the usufruct of the railway, as well as the compensation that is to be stipulated for the use of the zones for the additional administrative expenses that the construction of the canal will impose upon Colombia, and also the advance payment of $7,000,000 and the comparative cost and conditions upon which the United States reasonably would be expected to acquire concessions satisfactory to it in respect of any other canal.

But how does it fix those rates, Mr. President? It goes on to provide that there shall be two representatives from the State of Colombia, two representatives from the United States, and if they can not agree, which of course they would not, then the fifth arbitrator is called in, and it is provided that—

The president of such high commission shall be the president, for the time being, of the International Peace Tribunal of The Hague, and the determination reached by said commission, by a majority vote, concerning such fair and reasonable annuity that is to be paid to Colombia by the United States in conformity with this article, shall be binding upon the contracting parties.

THE HAND OF THE FOREIGNER.

That virtually places the fixing of the rate of compensation per annum that the United States shall pay for its canal, the right of operating it through the State of Colombia, if we acquire the Panama route, at the rental the president of The Hague Peace Conference shall name. He lives 3,000 miles or more away from the United States; he has no common interest with us; and yet by memorandum of the treaty that is to be made he virtually fixes the rate. He can confiscate that railroad or canal and all that we have expended there, and we have no rights whatever in it according to the memorandum of this convention.

If these rates are not satisfactorily adjusted, then Article XXVI provides that—all the concessions granted by this convention shall be forfeited, and all the works, principal and accessory, machinery, and properties of the canal shall become the property of the Republic of Colombia, and the same Republic shall recover its actual rights over the Panama Railway without any obligation to return any of the sums that it may have received in conformity with this convention.

In any ordinary franchise there is a provision made that the rates of toll shall not be less than to pay a certain sum per annum upon the investment therein made. There is no such limitation here. The rate fixed can be whatever the president of The Hague Peace Conference may name, and we are virtually in his power. As I said, it may result in a confiscation of the property.

I was surprised when I gave a cursory reading to this document yesterday to see that the interests of the United States were in no way protected by this proposed treaty, and I can not, therefore, as a business proposition, seriously consider such a measure. I would not as an individual or as one representing a private company or corporation, and surely as one of the representatives in part of a great State I can not cast my vote in favor of a measure that leaves every dollar invested by the United States there virtually in the hands of the president of The Hague Peace Tribunal, which might amount, as I said before, to a virtual confiscation of every dollar we put in the property.

PANAMA ENTAILS POLITICAL AND FINANCIAL DIFFICULTIES.

But, Mr. President, some canal we are all in favor of. There is no doubt as to the necessity of an isthmian canal or as to who shall build it. It is to be built, and built only by the United States. The only question remaining to be solved is that relating to the route to be selected. We have hitherto looked only to the route across Nicaragua; but now, unfortunately, that route which all of us formerly looked upon with more than doubt has been brought forward as an alternative, and we are compelled to make choice between Nicaragua and Panama. At first glance it will appear to many, doubtless, that there is not much difference in availability, but I think that a careful study of the problems presented by the Panama scheme which has been proposed by the Isthmian Commission will result in a decision in favor of the Nicaragua route.

In my opinion, to take hold of the Panama scheme, which has had as its principal characteristic from the beginning fraud of the most gigantic kind, will involve this country in political and financial troubles that may be far-reaching and disastrous. We are asked to give to the French canal company $40,000,000 for a 50-mile railroad, old machinery, and plans, and for the right to utilize the excavations which it has made at a cost to the French people of about $260,000,000 in cash.

It will be noted that the sale of the property and assets of the old company to the new was upon the express condition that the property and rights thus transferred should revert to the estate of the old company in liquidation upon default in the completion of the canal within the time fixed in the concession. It will also be noted that the old company has a claim upon the new of 60 per cent of the surplus income after paying all expenses, charges, and stipulated dividends, the sum thus paid to be properly distributed by the liquidator. It will still further be noted that this agreement, according to the statement of the New Panama Canal Company, in Senate Document No. 188, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, page 31, was by private contract.

FRENCH PEOPLE HAVE AN INTEREST IN PANAMA.

The persistency with which M. Hutin, president of the New Panama Canal Company, pressed on the Isthmian Commission a claim to a share in the profits of the canal after completion would seem to have in view this obligation. It was only at the last moment that it was dropped.

We could, I believe—

Wrote M. Hutin to Admiral Walker—continue to maintain that our claim is just and well founded.

But he finally announced that—we are now prepared to relinquish totally our claim to a share in the eventual profits of the management of the canal, having in mind that this surrender constitutes on our part an act of conciliation, which must be taken into account during the discussion of our other propositions.

This claim of a share of the profits, as well as the provision for the return to the old company of its property and assets, in case the canal was not completed in accordance with the concessions, is in the interests of the stockholders of the old company, who number 600,000 or 700,000 French citizens.

Mr. MITCHELL. Eight hundred thousand.

Mr. PERKINS. I am on the conservative side, and I shall endeavor to be so in all the statements I make.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will say to the Senator that the figure I state is the testimony of the representative.

Mr. PERKINS. The value of the property, assets, etc., can be returned to them through the purchase money given for them by the United States, so their interests are protected as to that, but the price of their consent to this transfer of property to the new company was the 60 per cent interest in the canal earnings, from which they were to partially recoup themselves for the losses they had sustained. I think it may be questioned whether a private contract thus entered into for the benefit of half a million or more Frenchmen can be abrogated by the president of the new canal company. Through this agreement the stockholders of the old company are given an interest in the profits of the completed canal. It is part of the assets of the old company and, it would seem to me, can not be transferred to the United States without furnishing good ground for an action to recover. If such ground exists, it is not improbable that the French Government would be able, by championing the rights of so many of its citizens, to very greatly embarrass the United States in the prosecution of the work of building the canal, even if it did not ultimately enforce its claim of an interest in the undertaking.

LOSS THROUGH THE PANAMA RAILROAD.

The United States must purchase the stock of the Panama Railroad Company, which will require the expenditure of $7,000,000. All of it must be bought or the United States will have partners in the canal enterprise. At present the new canal company holds all but 1,100 shares, these latter being owned in this country and in Europe. Whether they can be secured by the United States at a reasonable figure is very doubtful. The owners hold the key to a very important position, and will not, it is likely, yield it for a payment of a mere par value. What they would exact from such a rich interested party as the United States can only be conjectured. If they offered to sell, it is sure that they would demand a large sum—far greater than the United States would pay. As it would not be policy to begin work until the shares were secured, negotiations to that end would be continued indefinitely, to the corresponding delay of construction.

Supposing, however, that the United States secured all the shares at par. Their cost would be $7,000,000, but with them it would also assume obligations as follows: Mortgage bonds, bearing 4½ per cent interest, $2,504,000; sinking-fund subsidy bonds issued to the Colombian Government, bearing 6 per cent interest, $996,000. Total, $3,500,000, less cash assets, $438,569.33, held January 15, 1902. Supposing the incredible, that these assets should remain practically at that figure when the canal is purchased by the United States, the latter will be under obligations of nominally $3,000,000. But it will be noted that the bonds bear a very high rate of interest—higher than the holders can obtain in other investments. They will not, therefore, sell at par; they will demand more; they will undoubtedly deem that, to secure the interest they are now receiving, they must receive as much as, at 3 per cent, will bring them this sum. The sinking-fund subsidy bonds, therefore, will be held for $1,992,000 and the mortgage bonds at $3,756,000. This will make the total indebtedness $5,748,000, bringing up the cost of the Panama Railroad to the United States to $12,748,000. But there must be a diversion of this railroad, which the Commission estimates will require the expenditure of $1,267,500. The Panama Railroad, therefore, would actually cost the United States $14,015,500.

WHERE $13,000,000 WILL GO.

But the Commission says that the earnings of the railroad during the construction of the canal will be so great that its indebtedness can be easily paid. It is of interest to know, however, who would pay these increased earnings. The increased work, outside of hauling food and clothing for laborers employed, would be that incident to the construction of the canal, and of course the United States would be the one from whom the charges would be collected. If the earnings of the road, which belong to the United States, have to be paid out in settlement of the road's indebtedness, it is clear that this indebtedness is paid by our Government. The Commission's assumption, therefore, that the debts of the road will not have to be paid by the United States is without foundation. The Government must stand ready to pay the whole sum represented by the bonds.

But, says the Commission, "After the completion of the canal its commercial profits will probably cease, but it will have a value incidental to operating the canal." That value can not be more than the cost of constructing 50 miles of railroad, which, at the very liberal estimates of $40,000 per mile, will amount to $2,000,000. All the rest of the expenditures on account of the road will be a total loss to the United States, and this loss will aggregate nearly $13,000,000.

But, assuming for the sake of argument, that there will be no financial or political complications by purchasing the French excavations, the question remains, Is the Panama route preferable to or even as good as that through Nicaragua? It seems to me that there is good evidence that the Panama route is far from the best. The questions presented have been studied by United States engineers and naval officers, and convincing arguments against Panama have been made.

COMPARISON OF THE TWO ROUTES.

In his report of the problems relating to interoceanic communication by way of the American Isthmus, made by Lieut. John T. Sullivan, U. S. N., in 1883, in response to a resolution adopted by the Senate of the United States, adopted at a time, I think, when ex-Senator Chandler was Secretary of the Navy, he reports the following disadvantages of the Panama route. This is not what I say, but what a distinguished naval officer reported to our Government:

(1) The prevailing calms of Panama Bay.
(2) Want of materials for the purposes of construction.
(3) The large annual rainfall.
(4) Character of some of the swamp lands on certain portions of the line.
(5) A doubt as to the sufficiency of the water supply at all times.
(6) The unhealthfulness of the country.
(7) Greatly increased cost by the necessity for purchasing at a high figure the right of way from the Panama Railroad Company.

Against these disadvantages are placed the advantages of the Nicaragua Canal, as follows:

(1) It is in a favorable geographical position, being in the region of the trade winds, and is especially favorable to the United States.
(2) A canal constructed here will cost less than half as much as by any other route.
(3) It passes through a country rich in resources and already sufficiently developed to subsist the construction force. * * * There is an abundance of good stone, but it is not suitable for dimension stone. It will answer very well for concrete. There is plenty of limestone, and the kilns now in operation produce an excellent quality of lime suitable for hydraulic works. Bamboo, which would be useful in the works connected with the restoration of Greytown Harbor, can also be obtained in the country.
(4) It offers no engineering difficulties that are not easy of solution at a moderate expense. The difficulties to be encountered are such as are met with and overcome in all engineering works of this kind.
(5) It is a fresh-water canal, and will perform an important office in cleaning the bottoms and boilers of vessels passing through the canal.
(6) It offers splendid facilities for dockage and repairs on Lake Nicaragua, and it is not improbable that Patterson's grand scheme of establishing a distributing center for the commerce of the world may find its realization on the shores of Lake Nicaragua.
(7) All materials needed for the construction of the canal are close at hand.
(8) All plant can be conveyed by water communication already established and for which no royalty is to be paid. Between the lake and the Pacific several passable roads exist, and whatever other roads might be required over this short distance can be readily made at inconsiderable cost.
(9) The mean annual rainfall is comparatively small.
(10) The important physical feature of the route is the existence of Lake Nicaragua. It is not only capable of supplying twenty times the volume of water which the commerce of the world would require in the lockage of vessels, but receiving the drainage of 10,000 square miles of country, distributes the flood waters of that area over its superficies of 2,800 square miles, and thus relieves the San Juan Valley from extensive floods.

THE PANAMA ROUTE CAN NOT BE USED BY SAILING VESSELS.

These are some of the economic advantages of the Nicaragua Canal, as set forth by an impartial officer of the United States Navy. From a strictly maritime point of view, the advantages of Nicaragua are made equally plain.

Lieut. Frederick Collins, U. S. N., made, in 1880, before the Select Committee of the House of Representatives on the Oceanic Canal, the following statement relative to the winds and their relation to sailing vessels to and from the termini of the proposed Nicaragua and Panama canals:

No less person than Lieutenant Maury, "the father of the Physical Geography of the Sea," is said to have proclaimed that even if the Isthmus of Panama were to be divided by a convulsion of nature, it could never become a highway for sailing vessels on account of these unfavorable winds, calms, and currents.

It is certainly true that the prevailing meteorological conditions and oceanic currents in the vicinity of the west coast of the Isthmus of Panama are exceedingly unfavorable for either the approach or departure of sailing vessels.

In 1872 I had occasion, under directions from the Bureau of Navigation, to make a close examination of this subject, the results of which were published in Commander Selfridge's report of his surveys on the Isthmus. As a result of these investigations I was led to conclude that, comparatively speaking, no great difficulty need be experienced in getting from the vicinity of the Bay of Panama to a place where good winds might be found. A considerable detour from the most direct route would be necessary in most cases, it is true, but a careful computation gave only ten days as the average time that would be consumed in getting a sufficient offing to secure good winds, provided the correct route was pursued.

Now, ten days can hardly be considered a sufficiently formidable loss of time to preclude the use of the Isthmus route by sailing vessels, were it open. Indeed, in comparison of the time that would be saved on most voyages, ten days are a bagatelle. But if ten days can be saved by one Isthmus route that must be lost by another, then it becomes a matter of vital interest. And if in the comparison of two routes it can be demonstrated that one of them will bring our east and west coasts nearer by ten days than another, it appears to me that this fact alone would be sufficient to decide us in our choice.

I propose now to demonstrate beyond the possibility of denial, by a consideration of the winds and currents of the Pacific Ocean, that the Nicaragua route will give even a greater gain than that as compared with Panama or any route south of Panama on a voyage from New York or New Orleans to San Francisco.

LIEUTENANT MAURY'S SAILING DIRECTIONS.

Lieutenant Maury made an extensive examination of the subject and found that, in leaving the Bay of Panama for the North Pacific coast, a sailing ship must either proceed directly west, if the most favorable wind is found, but usually must shape her course south and make her westing south of the equator. In his sailing directions he says:

If he can get west here with a good breeze, he should crack on, and when his good wind fails him steer south again. * * * Therefore, in coming out of the Bay of Panama, and after crossing 5° north in any season, make a southwest course if the wind will allow. If the wind be southwest, brace up on the starboard tack; if it be south-southwest, stand west if it be a good working breeze. But if it be light and baffling, with rain, know that you are in the doldrums, and the quickest way to get clear of them is by making all you can on a due south course.

DIFFERENCE IN TIME IN FAVOR OF NICARAGUA.

Lieutenant Collins then explained to the committee the courses that must be taken by sailing vessels from the western termini of the Panama and Nicaragua canals to reach San Francisco. Comparing the distances and times, the result as given by him is as follows:

	Miles.	Days.
Panama to San Francisco	5,350	37
Nicaragua to San Francisco	3,240	23
Difference in favor of Nicaragua	2,110	14

On the return the difference in favor of Nicaragua is not so marked, but varies from five to six days. Lieutenant Collins then says:

The foregoing figures speak for themselves. They show that a canal at Nicaragua will bring New York or New Orleans nearer to San Francisco by nineteen days than will a canal at Panama or any of the proposed routes south of Panama. What other argument can be necessary to show the direction in which American interest lies?

A comparison of routes to other ports of the Pacific, while perhaps of less importance, is so interesting that I will ask your patience while I state briefly the results, without going into details.

To China, Manila, or Japan the difference in favor of the route from Nicaragua over that from Panama is 800 miles and five to six days.

To the Sandwich Islands the difference in favor of Nicaragua is 1,100 miles and seven to eight days.

To India, Batavia, Australia, and New Zealand the difference in favor of Nicaragua is 400 miles and two to three days.

Returning from China, Manila, Japan, or the Sandwich Islands the difference in favor of Nicaragua is 600 miles and four to five days.

Coming, now, to a comparison of routes to ports on the west coast of South America, we might naturally suppose that here the Nicaraguan route would be at a marked disadvantage as compared with Panama; but, curiously enough, such is not the case. A comparison shows that even to Valparaiso or Callao there is a difference of 200 miles and one to two days in favor of the route from Nicaragua over that from Panama. On the return from these places we find the sole instance in which the route to or from Nicaragua appears at a disadvantage, the difference being about 500 miles and four days, this time in favor of Panama.

All the foregoing distances are given in nautical miles, which contain 6,080 feet each, while the ordinary or statute mile contains but 5,280.

The foregoing results have reference to sailing ships, and the saving for steamers will not be nearly as large, amounting, in fact, only to the direct distance between the two Pacific termini. This is about 650 miles, and as it would be gained both ways, it would amount in the round trip to San Francisco to a saving of 1,300 miles, which in a 10-knot steamer would be a matter of five days.

AN EMPHATIC STATEMENT.

In a letter to Captain Pim, royal navy, Lieutenant Maury has this to say as to the comparative merits of the Panama and Nicaragua canals, still quoting Lieutenant Collins:

"The great importance of one or more good commercial highways across Central America being admitted, the whole question of route resolves itself pretty much into a question of cost of construction and facility of ingress and egress by sea to and from the opposite termini; the latter is an affair of winds and currents, and their influence is powerful. Panama has the advantage of land transit; Nicaragua has the advantage in winds, terminal ports, and climate. The first is obvious, but to place the latter in a clear light some little explanation is necessary. * * * I have spoken of the calm belt about the equator. Panama is within its range. * * * It is difficult to convey to any one who has never experienced these calms an idea of the obstinacy with which they vex navigation. We are all familiar with calms at sea which last for a few hours, or even a day, but here they last for days and weeks at a time. I have known vessels going to or from Panama to be detained by them for months at a time. * * * On one occasion the British Admiralty, wishing to send one of their vessels into the Arctic Ocean from Panama in time to save the season, had her towed by a steamer through this calm belt and carried 700 miles out to sea before she could find a breeze.

"These remarks apply to the approach and departure by sea to or from the Pacific terminus of any route across the Isthmus of Panama or Darien, and even with greater force to the Atrato and others on the South American side of Panama. In short, the result of my investigations into the winds and currents of the sea, and their influence upon the routes of commerce, authorize the opinion which I have expressed before and which I repeat, namely: If nature, by one of her convulsions, should rend the Continent of America in twain and make a channel across the Isthmus of Panama or Darien as deep, as wide, and as free as the Straits of Dover, it would never become a commercial thoroughfare for sailing vessels, saving the outward bound and those that could reach it with leading winds. * * *

"We come now to the Nicaragua routes. * * * It is to this part of the Isthmus that we must look for a route that shall best fulfill the present requirements of commerce. * * * Vessels under canvass would in the main do the fetching and carrying for the Nicaragua route, which for reasons already stated they can not do for Panama. The aggregate amount of this trade is immense, and it is neither accommodated for Panama nor Panama for it. * * * You will observe at a glance that the Isthmus of Panama or Darien is, on account of these winds and calms, in a purely commercial point of view, the most out-of-the-way place of any part of the Pacific coast of intertropical America."

"The foregoing quotations from this eminent authority," says Lieutenant Collins, "certainly substantiate fully the deductions that I have already drawn from my own investigations. Better than that, they prove that my prejudice in favor of Nicaragua, if I have any, has not led me to overstate the case in its favor, but that, on the contrary, in my desire to keep within indisputably safe bounds I have greatly understated it."

WHY SAILING VESSELS DO NOT USE THE SUEZ CANAL.

It has been claimed by some critics that sailing tonnage would not figure appreciably in the traffic of an isthmian canal, and that in consequence the matter of winds may be disregarded in selecting the best location. This assertion is based, in the first place, on the fact that no sailing vessels, practically, have used the Suez Canal. If they will not use the canal at Suez, it is urged, they will not use an isthmian. It is a fact that no sailing vessels have passed through the Suez Canal since 1874, except during the time of the Turko-Russian war, in 1877–78, when a few sailing ships came through from Calcutta with Indian troops. But it appears from the report of United States Consul-General Long at Cairo that there is a very good reason why sailing vessels will not use the Suez Canal. He says:

The absence of sailing vessels in the canal is explained by the difficulties of navigation in the Red Sea. The extraordinary number of sailing vessels lost in the Red Sea (which is full of dangerous reefs and shoals) during the years 1872-73 seems to have effectually discouraged further attempts.

Thus it is evident that dangers to navigation in the Red Sea prevent sailing ships from using the short cut to the Orient, and not any disadvantages presented by the canal itself. Were it not for the difficulties of approach to and departure from the canal, it would be used as universally as it is by steam vessels.

So it would be in the case of a canal at Panama. The difficulties and dangers that would be experienced by sailing ships in the Gulf of Panama would prevent them from ever using a canal through the Isthmus at that point. So this class of tonnage would have to be eliminated from the consideration of the earnings of the enterprise. And that the loss in earnings would be very great there can be no doubt, when we consider how great a proportion of the trade of the Pacific to and from the Atlantic States and Europe is now carried in sailing ships. For the port of San Francisco alone the arrivals and departures of ocean-going sailing vessels equal or exceed those of steam vessels in the same trade.

SAILING TONNAGE OF SAN FRANCISCO.

In 1898 there were 494 arrivals of sailing ships, aggregating 530,092 tons, against 330 steam vessels, aggregating 592,865 tons; while the clearances were 419 sailing vessels, of 464,153 tons, against 331 steam vessels, aggregating 567,547 tons. In previous years the proportion of sailing vessels and tonnage is the same or greater, so that it is safe to say that for this port (and the same can be asserted for the other Pacific ports of the United States) the sailing tonnage in foreign trade equals the steam tonnage. In the grain-carrying trade of this port alone over 200 sailing vessels are employed each year, and there is no likelihood that the number will be diminished, for the sailing vessel is the most economical carrier of this kind of freight. And as wheat is carried from the Pacific coast almost exclusively to Europe, it will be at once seen that a canal at Panama would prevent its use to fully 500,000 tons of shipping in the wheat trade alone, which would only too readidly take the short cut through a canal at Nicaragua. Taking account of other than the grain trade, it is probable that the selection of the Panama route would prevent fully 1,000,000 tons of sailing ships from using the isthmian canal. Not only would the canal lose yearly a very large amount in tolls, but a very considerable commerce of the world would not be benefited by the canal. Its object would be only half accomplished.

When the great resources of our Pacific States, from Mexico to Alaska, are more fully developed; when, as in the case of California, instead of nine persons to the square mile, as we have now, the number shall have increased, as it will increase in the next decade, to twenty or thirty persons to the square mile, our products for export will double or quadruple in value, and so in that proportion will the demand for vessels to transport our surplus to foreign countries be increased.

WHY THE SAILING VESSEL WILL STAY.

But it is sometimes argued, and it has been so argued upon this floor again and again, that the sailing ship is going out of use, and so need not be given much consideration. But those who are interested in maritime affairs know that the day of the sailing vessel is not yet closed, and will not be while the free winds from heaven blow to fill her sails. The ports of the world, especially those of the Pacific, are filled with the tall masts of sailing fleets. There are trades and routes from which they can not be driven, and new designs, and such class of ships, barks, and five and six masted schooners, are contributing to the maintenance of the sailing tonnage of the world. By means of these new designs the cost of operation is being constantly reduced and an element of economy introduced into the ocean carrying trade. With a canal through Nicaragua which could be used by such vessels, an impetus would be given to this class of ocean carriers, especially to those engaged in trade between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of North, South, and Central America. The result would be a lower average of ocean freight rates than would be the case were the Panama Canal built, excluding from this trade vessels moved by wind power, the very cheapest motive power known in the world. Commerce, therefore, would be benefited more by the Nicaragua than by the Panama route.

GREAT LOSS IF SAILING VESSELS CAN NOT USE THE CANAL.

Prof. Lewis Haupt, a member of the Isthmian Canal Commission, is distinctly and emphatically of the opinion above set forth. Professor Haupt not only gave this phase of the question particular attention as his part of the work of the Commission, but came to it with the great advantage of having served on two previous commissions which studied the problems involved in an isthmian canal. He has been over both routes. Although he signed the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission which gave a verdict in favor of Panama, he did so for these reasons, as stated to the Senate Committee:

> I beg leave to say that while conceding to the wishes of the majority and signing a report in order to make it unanimous, and so, if possible, to secure legislation at this session, I still feel and did then that there were certain economic, physical, engineering, sanitary, and commercial advantages inherent to the Nicaragua route which gave it a decided preference over the Panama route.
> In this, of course, I do not consider the cost of the concessions, nor especially the cost of constructing the canal, but I think the others are of so preponderating weight as to overbalance any difference in the latter two items. The economic advantage is, a priori, the most important factor in the operation and utility of an interoceanic waterway, and that is briefly summed up in the report of the Commission by the statement that the Nicaragua Canal possesses an advantage between home ports of one day for all north-bound commerce—that is, whether it be of European or American origin, or whether it has its destination in the Orient or North Pacific ports—and for all Gulf ports it would save about two days.
> I have made an estimate of that saving, based upon the average cost of moving vessels of about 3,000 tons capacity, which I have figured at about $250 a day. Some of these vessels have cost as high as $1,000 a day to operate and maintain, and some of them as low as $100 a day; but taking it at that average and estimating on a basis of 10,000,000 tons, of which, say, 75 per cent is north bound, the economy on that basis would amount to about $950,000 a year on steam alone. But as a large percentage would be carried by sail if this route be opened, the economy would probably be 50 per cent more, or about $1,000,000.

PANAMA AWAY FROM THE PATH OF COMMERCE.

Professor Haupt further testified that the Panama route is directly away from the path of commerce, or nearly at right angles to it, so that every mile of the canal is a detour from the direct line of traffic, which is—> a violation of a sound engineering and economic principle, while every mile of the Nicaragua route is in the line of or is near the line of traffic as it is possible to place it. So that the difference in the length of the route which is urged as an objection to the Nicaragua route is in reality no objection whatever.

The only fault that I find with Professor Haupt is that he signed the majority report of the Isthmian Canal Commission. If I had a conviction, as I have, that the Nicaragua Canal route is the best and the most economical route I would do just what I am doing to-day. I would give the best reasons I could why we should adopt it. I would be consistent, as I was when I first espoused it twenty or thirty years ago, when I was president of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco. My course would be northeast until I was satisfied that some other course was the proper one to steer. I think the Professor has permitted the opportunity for a good bargain to influence him, if I may say so. He is like Mrs. Toodles, who could not go into a store without buying something if it was cheap. So I think the Professor was fascinated with the apparently cheap price at which the Panama Canal, which had cost so much money, although the work which had been done is of no practical value, could be purchased. He thought it was a great bargain, and so he permitted his convictions that the Nicaragua route was the best to be influenced by the chance of a good bargain, and he joined with the majority of the Commission in recommending its purchase because it had cost so much and we could get it so cheaply.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If the Senator will permit me, does he think that the testimony of a man who holds such unstable opinions would be of any value upon this subject?

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire, if that be so, why spend so much money on such a project as that of the Panama Canal?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. We are not proposing to spend this money upon his present opinion.

TONNAGE EQUALLY DIVIDED BETWEEN SAIL AND STEAM.

Mr. PERKINS. In answer to my friend from Indiana, I would say if nature has not given us in the Nicaragua route all these great advantages, why is it that my friend from Indiana and so many of his associates try to raise so many objections against it and urge us to buy the Panama Canal route, a scheme which was conceived in iniquity? As to the work that has been done there, it is of no practical benefit whatever, so far as the construction of a canal is concerned. I will show later on, I think, if figures amount to anything, that it is an impracticable thing to build a dam there. We can damn the proposition, but whether we can dam the Chagres successfully and have a lake that will remain there during the dry season and will not wash away in the wet season is a question.

As to the total tonnage of the United States, Professor Haupt states that it is about equally divided between sail and steam, so that to benefit ocean commerce to the greatest extent the canal must be suited to the use of both kinds of ocean transportation. He confirms the opinion given above that the sailing ship will hold its own because of the greater economy in operating them, and instances as proof of this the rapid increase of large six and seven masted vessels of schooner rig.

I want to say to my distinguished friend from Indiana that to a layman—and I only speak from a layman's standpoint—his conclusions remind me very much of decisions I have heard rendered in courts. The judges reasoned splendidly; their arguments were all on my side of the case, but when they drew their conclusions they decided against me. Their arguments were good, but they decided differently from the way they reasoned. So it seems to me with Professor Haupt in this case. He reasons splendidly for the Nicaragua route, but he signs, with the majority of the Commission, on the other side.

THE ROUTE OF A SAILING VESSEL FROM PANAMA.

The Atlantic Refining Company, of Philadelphia, proposes to carry its oil in sailing vessels. Coal and all cheap material needed in manufactures are carried in this way, and will doubtless always be. For all of this traffic the Panama Canal would be prohibitory, for the reasons before set forth. In discussing this phase of the question Professor Haupt called attention to the fact that a sailing vessel going out of Panama Bay in order to make the best time to San Francisco would have to sail south to or near the Gallapagos Islands, on the equator, then west 1,500 miles in order to take advantage of winds and currents.

I want to say to my friend from Indiana that I have been becalmed in the doldrums about 5° south of the equator for six weeks, when there was not wind enough there to fill the sails, and we brailed them up in their gaskets to the mast. For six weeks we remained there in the doldrums, as I have said, with hardly a breath of air, certainly with not enough wind to create what we call a cat's-paw, with the water as smooth as glass.

It has been stated to me by residents of Panama—

Professor Haupt testified, confirmed by the consular reports, in which it is printed—> that vessels have been longer in getting out of the bay and reaching their port of destination—Valparaiso or San Francisco—than the time required to sail from New York via Cape Horn.

He said the usual time is two or three weeks getting out of the bay, and he related an experience of the captain of the Pacific Mail steamer Golden Eagle, who, on leaving Panama, passed a sailing vessel 40 miles from that port, bound in, and after making the round trip to San Francisco and back, found the same vessel, on his return, still 10 miles from Panama, and still bound in.

HUNDREDS OF MILES OF TOWING PROPOSED.

Towing would not bring with it any advantage, for even to tow a sailing vessel outside of Panama Bay would require twice the towage needed through the Nicaragua Canal, and then she would not be in a position to catch favoring tides and currents. If such vessel were towed 130 or 150 miles from Panama, making the length of towage equal to that through the Nicaragua Canal, it was asked by Senator HARRIS if this extra towing would not be sufficient to get the vessel out to sea, to which Professor Haupt replied:

That is true in part, and yet when the vessel gets 130 to 150 miles out she has not got as good winds or as favorable currents as if she were at Brito, some 300 or 400 miles farther, because all the time that she is being towed she is moving southwardly or away from the line of her traffic and must sail back if northbound. The geographic position is such that it is a detour which ought to be avoided, and this is possible by the other route. I think that covers the question raised by Senator HARRIS as to the physical conditions with this closing remark, that inasmuch as we are building a canal for all classes of vessels, that the factor of using sail ought to be very carefully considered, and in that respect I believe firmly that the Nicaragua Canal is greatly preferable to one at Panama.

Under such conditions of navigation, it can readily be seen by those least experienced in nautical affairs that no sailing ship would venture the passage by the Panama Canal. The Bay of Panama would kill this traffic for the canal as surely as the Red Sea has killed it for the canal at Suez. I submit that there is no economic consideration which has been or can be raised in connection with the choice of routes for an isthmian canal which would justify the Congress of the United States in deliberately choosing a route which would drive from it nearly one-half of the traffic which is waiting to take advantage of a canal, and which could and would use the alternative route.

THE ENGINEERING PROBLEM.

Considering the two canal routes from the point of view of the engineering problems presented and the manner in which it is proposed to solve them, the conclusion is inevitable that the Nicaragua route should be selected by the United States. Where grave doubt exists as to the efficacy of the plans adopted for one route, while there is acknowledged to be absolute certainty in the case of the other, there can, it seems to me, be no hesitation in choosing the route from which the element of doubt is eliminated.

It is acknowledged that the Bohio Dam is the vital point of the Panama Canal. It is absolutely necessary in order to obtain a supply of water for navigation. It therefore should be constructed in such a manner as to render it safe beyond the shadow of a doubt, and to do this considerations of economy should not be too closely regarded. It is evident that in the case of the Conchuda Dam of the Nicaragua route the Commission has not done so. The dam there proposed is built of stone on a rock foundation and firmly anchored by running it 200 feet or more into the hills on each side. The site selected by the Nicaragua Canal Commissioners at Boca San Carlos was condemned by the Isthmian Commission for the reason that at that site the greatest depth of rock upon which the dam foundation must be laid was 120 feet. At the Conchuda Dam the greatest depth is 82 feet. "This question of depth of foundation," says the Isthmian Commission, "is very important, because the foundations will probably have to be placed by the pneumatic process, and the depth (82 feet) is well within that at which the foundations of many bridge piers have been built by the same method." I think that this dam, constructed as planned by the Isthmian Commission, will be exposed to no danger of injury from any cause; but I do not think the Bohio Dam can be so considered.

THE BOHIO DAM.

In the first place, the Commission says that "for reasons of economy" an earth dam has been selected for Bohio. As it is even more vitally necessary to Panama than the Conchuda Dam is to Nicaragua, from the fact that it collects the necessary water, while the Conchuda Dam simply regulates an already inexhaustible supply, it is hard to see why economy should be exercised in its case and not in the other, unless for the purpose of making a favorable showing for the Panama route. The Bohio Dam is twice as long as that at Nicaragua and 85 per cent higher, making its vertical section 3.70 times as large. If the Panama Dam were constructed of the same material as that at Nicaragua, it would cost $15,000,000, even if the dam itself were no thicker. Being higher and longer, safety would demand thicker masonry, and its cost would thereby be increased. If it were made only 20 per cent thicker, the total cost would be $18,000,000, which would wipe out the difference in cost in favor of the Panama route and make the cost of the Nicaragua Canal less than that of Panama by a round $6,000,000.

But an earth dam having been determined upon, let us see whether it is as satisfactory as its importance in connection with the canal demands.

The Technical Commission, which made exhaustive studies of the problem for the New Panama Canal Company, and the International Commission, composed of 14 engineers of world-wide reputation from France, Germany, England, Russia, Colombia, and the United States, agreed upon a plan for the formation of a lake at Bohio. This lake was to be made by the construction of an earthen dam 1,286 feet long and a maximum height above the surface of the river of 67 feet, impounding a lake of 21½ square miles. The extreme height from the bottom of the foundation was fixed at 93½ feet. In this plan it was proposed to have a second dam at a higher level at Alhajuela, to serve as a first regulator of the Chagres floods, and to prevent them from entering Bohio Lake furiously, as the "total volume of the freshets would certainly produce currents detrimental and dangerous to navigation."

WHAT EMINENT ENGINEERS THINK.

The omission of the dam at Alhajuela would necessitate the—increase of several meters more in height [of the Bohio Dam], a scheme unanimously looked upon as overbold.

Again, in another part of the report, the commissioners state that—this solution [of a second dam] is the only one meeting the conditions for regulating the freshets without giving the Bohio Dam such proportions as are considered too bold.

And again:

Considering the importance of that structure in relation to the safety of the canal itself, it was deemed that here, more than anywhere else, it was necessary to be very cautious, and consequently the maximum elevation of 20 meters (65.5 feet) was fixed upon as that of the level of the lake to be formed by the building of the Bohio Dam. * * * Such is the result to which we are led in considering direct feeding through the Chagres if we do not wish, in determining the proportions to be given to the main structure of that plan, to deviate from the prudent rules which the commission consider as absolute.

In the light of this report of 14 of the most eminent engineers of Europe and America, can not the plan of the United States Isthmian Canal Commission be considered too bold? Is there not room to question the soundness of their decision and an opportunity given for the entrance of doubt as to the stability of the dam proposed by it at Bohio, and its efficacy at all times should it stand?

THE BOHIO DAM TOO BOLD A SCHEME.

In the first place, the United States Commission has increased the length of the dam from 1,286 feet to 2,546 feet, has raised its crest from 67 feet to 100 feet, and its total height from the bottom of the foundation from 93½ feet to 228 feet, while the pressure of water against it is raised from about 65 feet to 92 feet. Here is a structure which indeed the commission of engineers would undoubtedly condemn as far "too bold." Not only is the limit of perfect safety in height above river level, as established by them, exceeded by 49 per cent and the depth of water by 37 per cent, but the length of dam is doubled, making the pressure of water against it 2.74 times as great. And to retain this great lake an earthen dam is proposed of proportions which eminent engineers condemn as "too bold," while at Conchuda a solid stone dam, firmly anchored in abutting hills, is required to hold in check simply a pool less than a third as wide and not so deep. Besides this, in the case of the Bohio Dam 310 feet of the core must be laid by the pneumatic process at a depth of 128 feet below the sea level, a depth not hitherto attempted, I am informed. There is thus a doubt as to the ability to lay at this depth a structure of such a character as to meet all the requirements of the case.

And more than this. It is very doubtful whether the Bohio Dam, as planned by the Isthmian Commission, will, even if satisfactory as to strength and durability, accomplished what is expected of it. It will be remembered that the commission of engineers made a second dam at Alhajuela a necessary part of the plan of a lake at Bohio. In this, says the commission—would be stored the volume of water necessary for the water supply and operations of the canal during periods of deficiency in the natural output of the Chagres, and that portion of the excess of the freshets which must be retained in order to restrict the oscillations of Bohio Lake to its strictly necessary limit, and thus avoid too great fluctuations of its surface.

A SECOND RESERVOIR NECESSARY.

The United States Isthmian Canal Commission, while omitting the second reservoir from its plan, has in view its contingency, and acknowledges that it will be necessary when the traffic of the canal exceeds 10,000,000 tons per year. Even our own Commission, therefore, states that at some time this second big dam must be built at Alhajuela, while the European and American experts contend that it must be constructed at the same time as the Bohio Dam, in order to insure unimpeded navigation of the canal. That it must be built, therefore, is certain, the only question being that of date. Its cost, in consequence, must be taken into account in estimating the total cost of the canal to the United States. No estimate is given by the Isthmian Commission, but as that body advises a stone dam it is probable that its cost will be at least that of the structure at Conchuda, or over $4,000,000. By that sum, then, must the cost of the canal to the United States be increased, and still further augmented by the cost of a railroad to the site of the dam, which, at $75,000 per mile, would cost $750,000, or a total of $5,000,000 for the additional water supply

Added to this must be the cost of additional lands required for the Bohio Dam and spillway, which the Isthmian Commission in its report of January 18 says are necessary. The estimated cost of these lands is not given, but will of necessity be considerable and must be added to the cost of the Panama Canal as given by the Commission.

Mr. President, I might go on and give my own views and experience in the construction of dams for the storage of waters, for I have had some very considerable experience in that line, but I deem it much better to offer the testimony of these experts, who have given this subject-matter their personal and careful consideration, than to criticise their mode of constructing a dam and discuss the probability of its being able to withstand the great freshets and the great fall of water from the heavens in that country.

MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION UNCERTAIN AS TO THE FEASIBILITY OF THE BOHIO DAM.

The opinion as to the uncertainty attending the construction of the Bohio Dam is borne out by the testimony of the members of the Isthmian Canal Commission before the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals. Admiral Walker gave evidence that everything, so far as a canal is concerned, depends on the stability and efficiency of that dam. Here is an extract from the testimony on that point:

Senator HARRIS. Mr. Morison not only objects to the cost, but he has some apprehension with regard to the construction of the dam [at Bohio]. He says it involves "novel and untried features. Few engineers even among those who feel that they could construct it would be ready to say in advance how the work would be done. The difficulties taken in connection with the climate and other surroundings are enormous."

Admiral WALKER. Yes; it will be a difficult work.

Senator HARRIS. He also speaks in another place in this article of the extreme difficulty of getting the work of the caissons at the bottom and making the foundation water-tight. In fact, he says here, "The design involves the extension of pneumatic work to unprecedented depths, involving special details in making the joints between the caissons," and it is owing to his doubt, apparently, of the success of the work that he strongly recommends the other plan.

Admiral WALKER. I think he agreed that the work could be done, but he thought there would be a large saving of money in building a different style of dam, and that the style of dam which he advocated would be a sufficiently good one. It was a question of seepage—of how much water would go under the earth dam which was proposed by the French engineers and that which is proposed by Mr. Morrison, whether enough would go under to make it dangerous.

Senator HARRIS. The fact is with regard to the Bohio dam that the future of that is just as much an unknown quantity as the future of the dam at Conchuda?

Admiral WALKER. I should say it was more of an uncertain feature. It is a greater work and a more difficult work to build. The Conchuda dam I look upon as practically settled.

Senator HARRIS. So that we know no more about the possibilities and contingencies at Bohio than we do at Conchuda; in fact, less?

Admiral WALKER. We know less about the contingencies at Bohio, but that is the only point in the whole line about which we are at all uncertain.

Senator HARRIS. But that is the vital point.

Admiral WALKER. That is the vital point. Yes, it is vital to the canal, because the safety of the canal depends on the integrity of the dam in both cases. * * * I know of nothing along the Panama line which is not well within engineering precedents with the exception of the dam at Bohio, which is a very large work and would have to be carefully considered.

THE CONCHUDA DAM IS SAFE AND PRACTICABLE.

From this evidence before the committee it thus appears that Admiral Walker considers the Conchuda Dam, on the Nicaragua route, as practically settled. No question regarding its safety or efficacy can be raised. But it is wholly different in the case of the one vital point on the Panama route—the Bohio Dam. Engineer Morrison, a member of the Commission, intimates that few engineers feel that they could construct it, but that if undertaken the difficulties would be enormous. As an alternative he proposed a dam of a type which the Commission regarded unsafe. So these two advocates of the Panama route can not agree on a practicable and safe dam for that route.

And here another member of the Commission testified as to the difficulties if not impracticability of the Bohio Dam. Professor Haupt, before the Senate committee, emphasized the importance of this dam to the canal, stating that the integrity of the entire line depends on the ability to build and maintain it. But he had grave doubts as to the possibility of doing so, pointing out the fact that the experience in sinking caissons in bridge work 110 feet, which it is claimed has been done, gave no ground for belief that a concrete wall could be laid at a depth of 128 feet. The character of the work to be done is entirely different, as he thus explained before the Senate committee:

CHARACTER OF WORK AT BOHIO.

Mr. HAUPT. A bridge pier is usually composed of only one isolated structure placed upon bed rock or other suitable material, whereas in this case there are a series of those structures which must be placed in juxtaposition, and then the space between them outside of this bell or caisson must be filled in and made impermeable. Otherwise the dam will leak at the bottom under the pressure, and that is the serious part of this question.

These caissons are supposed to be placed as nearly contiguous as possible, and then the spaces between them are filled in by "fillers," or what might be called dowels, set in grooves between the caissons. If the grooves do not come exactly opposite, there is difficulty in getting those spaces closed, and the whole space between the ends of the abutting caissons must be filled thoroughly with concrete or impermeable material, although concrete is not entirely impermeable. * * *

In the drawings shown for the Bohio Dam, in studying it critically recently, I noticed the caissons are not shown as going entirely to rock through their whole base, but one edge of them only rests upon the rock and the other edge on sand.

Senator HAWLEY. When you speak of rock do you mean granite?

Mr. HAUPT. It is the kind of rock met at that particular place; the borings show hard rock. I do not remember the character of it. It may be a hard limestone. The caissons must be sunk farther really than the depth to the surface of the rock, because if one edge touches on the edge of a sloping rock that must be excavated and the whole bed be leveled off for the entire length of each of the caissons.

Senator HARRIS. Do you mean to say that the Commission did not provide for an excavation to level bearings of each caisson?

Mr. HAUPT. That is what the drawings show. I was surprised to find it so. In the case of the Panama Dam it is not, as it is in this case at Nicaragua, where the caissons are shown as penetrating the line of rock throughout their whole lengths; but at Bohio the print shows that the bottom line is half in rock and half in earth. Of course that would be a failure, and it is probably an oversight on the part of the draftsmen which has escaped the criticism of the committee having it in charge. I presume, however, that the estimates are based upon the sinking of those caissons into the rock and the leveling off of the bed for a bearing.

Senator FOSTER. Are there any such unknown or uncertain elements entering into the construction of the Nicaragua route?

Mr. HAUPT. No; there are not.

Senator HARRIS. There really is no point along the entire Nicaragua route—no question which is not well within the limitation of ordinary, you may say, engineering experience?

Mr. HAUPT. That is correct; yes, sir. There are three possible dam sites, either of which would be better than that one, on the Nicaragua route. Each dam site is better than that. The San Carlos dam site is better, and so is that at Ochoa; so is the present Conchuda, and it is possible by further boring that we may find a still better site.

INSUFFICIENT DATA AT BOHIO.

Professor Haupt read to the committee the final report of the Commission, a description of the borings made at Bohio, which shows that sufficient data was not secured as to the physical conditions of the foundation on which the dam must rest, lack of which data introduces an element of uncertainty that, added to the defective structure of the core-wall foundation, will condemn the Commission's plan in the eyes of any impartial engineer.

It is essential—

Says Professor Haupt—

that the gorge be absolutely sealed by this core wall, and that involves the fundamental idea that the foundations shall be so placed on solid rock as to prevent seepage.

This fundamental idea has been carried out at Conchuda, but not at Bohio.

Mr. Morison, in his testimony before the Senate committee, acknowledged that there were uncertainties in regard to the practicability of the Bohio Dam as planned by the Commission.

If—

He said—

you come right to the facts, I do not consider that the solution of the dam given by the Commission was the wisest one.

NEW AND UNTRIED PROBLEMS.

Colonel Hains, in his testimony, speaking of the Bohio Dam, in answer to the question whether he thought the dam as planned by the Commission a safe one, said:

I do not think that the question of the best type of dam for that place has been definitely settled. * * * You see these borings came in very late, and we got up that plan for that dam; but before any dam is built down there I suppose the engineer that undertakes it would want to take a thousand more borings.

Senator HARRIS. I have one more general question that I wish to ask you. Is there any engineering work on the Nicaragua line that is not easily within the limits of present engineering experience and knowledge?

Colonel HAINS. On the Nicaragua?

Senator HARRIS. Yes.

Colonel HAINS. I think not.

Senator HARRIS. There is no work there, either in the way of dams or locks or cuts, that involves any new and untried problems?

Colonel HAINS. No, sir.

Senator KITTREDGE. Is there on the Panama?

Colonel HAINS. I don't think there is in Panama unless it is this dam.

Senator HARRIS. Well, I thought we had discussed that, and I will put the additional question and refer to what Mr. Morison says. Mr. Morison thought it involved "new and untried problems," the construction at this dam.

Colonel HAINS. Yes.

Senator HARRIS. And you agree with that?

Colonel HAINS. Yes; I agree with that.

Colonel Ernst, in his testimony, said that the Conchuda Dam as planned by the Commission "is a much easier dam to build and a better dam than the Bohio Dam."

General Abbott testified that the plan of the Commission for the Bohio Dam "approaches the limits of uncertainty."

Whatever more evidence there may be as to the uncertainty surrounding the practicability of the Bohio Dam as planned by the Commission, it seems to me that sufficient evidence has been adduced from members of the Commission itself to render it certain that the Congress of the United States should not adopt the Commission's recommendation. On the other hand, there can be found, I think, no word of criticism of the plan proposed for the Conchuda Dam. It is practicable and safe, presenting no engineering work that is not within the experience of engineers. With this evidence before the Senate I do not see how it can select the Panama route. Common prudence will forbid it from investing nearly $200,000,000 of the people's money in an undertaking where the vital part of the work presents so much uncertainty and fails even to inspire confidence in those who planned it.

STEAMSHIPS CAN GO THROUGH THE NICARAGUA CANAL UNDER THEIR OWN STEAM.

An effort has been made to show that the Nicaragua Canal as planned would be less available for shipping than that at Panama on account of more curves and sharper curvatures. But Admiral Walker, when questioned by the Senate committee, testified that there would be no difference between the routes in this respect. Vessels can pass through both canals without difficulty, as appears from the following testimony:

Senator HANNA. Do you think that any large ship—the maximum-sized ship—operating in this canal could go around these bends without the aid of a tug? I mean steamship or otherwise.

Admiral WALKER. I think they would go without a tug by both canals.

Senator HANNA. Could they make all the turns?

Admiral WALKER. I think so.

Senator HANNA. Suppose the wind was blowing pretty hard?

Admiral WALKER. If there was a strong breeze, it might occasionally cause some trouble. By the Nicaragua line there would at times be a considerable current from the lake to the Conchuda Dam; with a strong wind blowing and a strong current they might have difficulty without a tug, but under ordinary circumstances I think they would go through without difficulty.

Senator HARRIS. Did not the Commission work out this question of curvature in detail in such a manner as to show clearly that no curvature is estimated in this work which would involve any difficulty in a vessel passing through there?

Admiral WALKER. I think there are no curves that would involve any particular difficulty ordinarily. Of course, with a strong wind blowing or with a strong current, a large ship might get into some trouble.

Senator HARRIS. That might happen anywhere on either route.

Admiral WALKER. Yes; but both routes are practically good enough for steamers to pass through with their own power.

DIFFERENCES OF CURVATURE IN THE CANALS.

Although in the matter of curvatures there is a considerable difference in favor of Panama, this difference is equalized on the Nicaragua route by making the canal wider at the turns. Admiral Walker testified that this widening was made in every case. He also stated that there is one curve on the Panama route that is sharper than any on the Nicaragua route. But as planned, according to the Isthmian Commission, a vessel can go through the Nicaragua Canal as safely and as easily as it can through that at Panama. On this score there can be no choice between the two routes. This is the opinion of the Commission. In this connection it must be remembered that on the Nicaragua route there are only 73.78 miles of canalization against 36.41 at Panama, the rest of the route being slack-water river navigation for 39.37 miles and 70.51 miles of lake navigation. The slack water of the river, whose channel is straightened by cutting through points of land, is really an arm of the lake through which there is discharged 76,000 to 63,000 cubic feet of water per second against an average annual discharge of only 3,200 cubic feet per second for the Panama Canal. With twenty times as much water over the San Juan arm of the lake as is available for the Panama Canal, and with unlimited water in the lake itself, it is easily seen that the navigation of 110 miles of the Nicaragua route will be virtually only a part of the voyage, and that comparison with Panama is possible—only 73.78 miles against 36.41 miles for Panama—considering the 13 miles through Lake Bohio as lake navigation. But, as before stated, the Commission is of the opinion that there is no ground for choice between the two routes on this score.

SOME MISLEADING DATA.

There have been introduced as an argument in favor of the Panama route the replies of navigators to a set of questions purporting to give conditions to be met with in navigating the two canals as planned. When we consider the nature of the data on which the questions were based, not much wonder may be felt at the character of the answers, for the data in the two most important cases were misleading, unintentionally no doubt, but still misleading. These ship captains were asked concerning the difficulties of navigating the Nicaragua Canal, with "over ten curves more than twice as sharp as those on the Panama route." Now, a curve that is twice as sharp as another is one which has only one-half the radius, which is a very serious matter, and it can not occasion surprise if the ship captains chose the ten curves with twice the radius of the short ones. But the fact is that the shortest curves on the Nicaragua route are not by any means twice as sharp as the sharpest on the Panama line, leaving out of consideration the curve from the harbor at Colon, which is by far the sharpest on either line.

Leaving this out of the case, then, the shortest curve on the Panama route is found to be of 6,243 feet radius, while the shortest on the Nicaragua route is 4,045 feet, approximately two-thirds of the radius of the Panama curve. The sharpness of the curves thus stand to each other in the proportion of three-thirds for Panama to two-thirds for Nicaragua, which makes the Nicaragua curve just one-third sharper than the Panama instead of twice as sharp. Thus, the actual curvature being in the proportion of four-sixths instead of three-sixths, the captains were questioned upon the basis of a curvature just 25 per cent sharper than actually exists.

Now, there are nine more curves of under 6,000 feet radius, running from 4,175 to 5,927 feet on the Nicaragua route, all of greater radius than that referred to above, to be compared with this short curve on the Panama route, so that the error of data becomes progressively more flagrant as we proceed through the canal. In fact, the proposition placed before the captains is so widely misleading that the answers that they gave on the comparative difficulties of navigation have no material bearing on the conditions as they will exist when the canal is constructed.

WHY THE EVIDENCE OF CERTAIN NAVIGATORS IS NOT CONCLUSIVE.

On another very important point the data placed before them was equally misleading. Here is the question that was asked them:

Consider both canals open and yourself bound from New York to San Francisco in a sailing ship, using the Nicaragua Canal you would have to be towed through the entire length—187 miles.

Through the Panama Canal you would also be towed 47 miles. By keeping your tug which would take you through the Panama Canal and letting it tow you straight out to sea 140 miles, you are out of the calm belt and have wind, having towed the same distance only as you would to have gotten through the Nicaragua Canal.

In view of all the conditions, winds, curves, calms, etc., governing each route, which canal would you use.

The answers are unanimously for Panama.

But are the conditions fairly stated here? I respectfully submit that the evidence is that when you get 140 miles away from Panama you are no more likely to catch a breeze than you are at Panama itself, where, in the days of the stampede to the California gold diggings, passengers on sailing ships in Panama harbor saw steamers leave on the run to San Francisco and return therefrom before they could find wind enough to start on their journey to the land of gold. Lieutenant Maury states, regarding the calms within whose range Panama lies, that he has known vessels going to or from Panama to be detained by them for months at a time. He says, as previously stated:

On one occasion the British Admiralty, wishing to send one of their vessels into the Arctic Ocean from Panama in time to save the season, had her towed by a steamer through this calm belt and carried 700 miles out to sea before she could find a breeze.

It is evident that the captains, in answering the above questions, assumed when it was erroneously said that they would find "wind" 140 miles out that a fair wind up the coast was meant. This, however, is practically never found. As will be seen from Lieutenant Maury's sailing directions, the only two courses open are to sail south—usually to the equator—about 600 miles, and then work westward for about a thousand more. Under such circumstances it is easy for even a landsman to see that there is no ground whatever to choose the Panama instead of the Nicaragua route, as from Brito a sailing ship is almost sure to at once catch a breeze and bear away on her course. You know, Mr. President, that there the trade winds prevail, and in this longitude, for certain seasons of the year, those winds blow continuously, and the vessel at that point receives the trade winds. The answers of the captains, therefore, to these hypothetical questions must be taken with as many grains of salt as exist in the element on which they make their living.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from California allow me?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. I will state that the chart submitted by the Hydrographic Bureau shows clearly the state of facts which the Senator from California suggests, that the hundred and forty miles towage would practically amount to nothing in reaching the trade winds.

Mr. PERKINS. I will say to the Senator that before he came into the Senate I read the sailing directions which were given by Lieutenant Maury, author of the theory of winds and currents of the ocean and a world-wide acknowledged authority upon the subject-matter. I think, as the Senator has stated, there can be no question as to the correctness of the position which he takes.

HEALTHFULNESS OF THE TWO ROUTES.

As to the healthfulness of the two routes there seems to be no room to question the very great superiority of Nicaragua. In its report the Commission did not indicate a preference, contenting itself with calling attention to the fact that during work on the maritime canal in Nicaragua the health of the working force was good, while the mortality at Panama was notorious. Colonel Hains testified that in regard to sanitary conditions the advantages are decidedly in favor of Nicaragua. Mr. Noble also thought that the advantages would be on the side of Nicaragua. Admiral Walker said that people would be more likely to contract sickness on the Panama line because the Isthmus has been a highway for hundreds of years, while on the Nicaragua route there have been practically no inhabitants. The consensus of opinion on this point is clearly and emphatically in favor of Nicaragua, and, as has been testified by engineers, the question of healthfulness of climate has a very important bearing on the cost of the work. There can be no question about the fact that because of the health conditions the canal at Panama will cost from 25 to 50 per cent more than at Nicaragua.

In respect to military advantages I do not think there can be any question as to the superiority of the Nicaragua route. This is acknowledged by Colonel Hains, who points out the fact that it is the shorter line between the two coasts of the United States.

In industrial and commercial value Colonel Hains is also of the opinion that Nicaragua has the advantage. In this opinion I think everyone will concur, for it is well known that there is an opportunity for development of a large and rich adjacent country, under favorable climatic conditions, whereas the condition of the Isthmus of Panama, after the years during which it has been a highway of travel, is practically no better developed than when it was a possession of Spain.

THE QUESTION OF TIME OF CONSTRUCTION.

Another advantage of the Nicaragua route, as planned, is the time necessary for construction—only eight years against ten for Panama—with the chances in favor of reducing the time on the former route and none on the latter, where the conditions to be met are as fully known as is possible in advance of further actual work. The Commission has figured very closely on Panama, but very liberally on Nicaragua. The chances of a reduction of time for the latter are far greater than for the former. In fact, all the greatest difficulties of the Nicaragua route are known, but it is doubtful if, in spite of all the work done at Panama, all difficulties of that route have been realized. This is a point which has been raised by Mr. Lyman E. Cooley, the eminent engineer who constructed the Chicago drainage canal, and who has personally examined both isthmian routes. He puts the situation very tersely. I consider Mr. Lyman E. Cooley one of the best engineering authorities in this or any other country. The Chicago drainage canal, to my mind, is one of the great achievements of this generation. The work has gone along quietly, with no display, with no talk, and yet the economy with which it has been done and the stability with which the canal has been constructed confer the highest encomiums upon those who have directed its work. Mr. Cooley says:

> And there is another element of doubt also as to whether the Frenchmen have not been up against a real problem as to whether it really was all steal and all incompetence, and whether Americans are at least twice as honest and twice as competent, or three times as honest and three times as competent, or somewhere in that ratio. It depends on where you draw the line as to honesty and competency between Americans and Frenchmen.
> If, in the aggregate, an American in honesty and competency be worth six Frenchmen, then the last estimate stands. If he is only worth four, you have got to add 50 per cent [to time and cost].

MORE OF NICARAOUA'S ADVANTAGES.

Another advantage of the Nicaragua route is the greater likelihood that material reductions in cost of construction can be made there than on the Panama route, owing to the extremely liberal estimates which the Commission has made and the greater number of points where in future reduced expenditures may on further examination be found possible.

Still another advantage of the Nicaragua route is the lower lift of the locks, the highest on this route being 37 feet against 45 at Panama, the latter being not only beyond engineering precedents, according to Professor Haupt, but exposed to greater deterioration if constructed. Besides this, two 45-foot locks in a flight, making a practically continuous lift of 90 feet, would be far more liable to injury from earthquakes than the single lower lifts on the Nicaragua route.

The Commission estimates that the cost of maintenance of the Nicaragua Canal will be $1,300,000 per year more than that of Panama. But with this estimate Professor Haupt does not agree. He testified before the Senate committee that the difference would not exceed $900,000. But it is probable that this excess can be materially reduced, as it would undoubtedly be found necessary to add to the expenses incident to the Panama route the interest on an entirely new set of hospital buildings, as it is not probable that competent American physicians and surgeons would consent to place new patients in the existing structures, which are, and for years have been, infected with yellow and pernicious malarial fever. The extravagance of the police department is obvious. This is placed at $508,300 per annum at Nicaragua and $251,000 at Panama, a difference in favor of Panama of $257,200, or more than one-half. All the figures given are increased by a 20 per cent contingency. Adding this to the Nicaragua estimate of $508,300, we have for police at Nicaragua $609,960 annually. In the Philippines each United States soldier (including officers) is estimated to cost $1,500 per annum, and the cost at Nicaragua should be rather smaller than greater. On this cost the Nicaragua route will need 406 police force! An energetic man would guarantee, I think, an efficient service with 75 men—50 on eastern and 25 on western division—in time of peace. In war time an army might be needed to aid at either route.

THE ARGUMENT BASED ON COST OF MAINTENANCE.

This, I think, is a fair sample of, to say the least, the very liberal estimates of the Commission as to the cost of maintenance. That they are liberal, indeed, for the Nicaragua Canal is evident from the letter of Mr. Cooley, which was read here the other day by Senator TURNER. Mr. Cooley states—and the statistics given by him are convincing—that the cost of maintenance would, on a liberal estimate, vary from $1,100,000 to $1,500,000 per year, or less than one-half the Commission's estimates.

But even assuming that the difference in maintenance is $1,300,000 in favor of Panama, should it be considered an argument in favor of that route? I think not, for the reason that from the Panama route are barred all sailing vessels, which could and would use the Nicaragua route. What this means is clearly set forth by Mr. Cooley in his testimony before the Senate committee. He there said:

> We will assume that a vessel can steam 3,000 miles for a dollar a ton. That is about the way of reckoning it when rates are running normally. On long routes it is something better than that. On a sailing route between San Francisco and Liverpool or Portland and Liverpool on wheat it is, say, a third of a mill per ton per mile. If you can save 500 miles, you save a sixth of a dollar on every ton of freight that is going through there. If it is 7,000,000 tons, that is $1,200,000 a year. Now, you have got $10,000,000 capital to your credit on account of saving this 500 miles, and you have got $1,200,000 a year in saving on the total traffic on the cost of running it by the shorter route. This is an offset against the excessive estimates for cost of operation and maintenance.

It is perfectly clear that the extra tonnage gained through sailing vessels would, in tolls, more than make up for the difference in maintenance of the Nicaragua Canal, while the direct gain to commerce would be immense. The low rate by sailing vessel via Nicaragua would develop to an enormous extent the trade in coal, lumber, cotton, iron, and all bulky and cheap commodities, leading, in turn, to the rapid increase in the number of sailing ships. The trade in oil alone, which, as has been pointed out, is being transferred from steamships to sailing vessels, would be a very important feature of the Nicaragua traffic. All the wheat and flour shipments to Europe would go via Nicaragua by sail. In fact, the possibilities of the Nicaragua route and their relation to commerce far outnumber those of a canal by the Panama route, compared with which the less cost of maintenance of the Panama Canal would be a mere bagatelle.

NEARER TO ASIA BY NICARAGUA.

Not the least of the benefits which the Nicaragua route would confer upon Atlantic coast commerce would be the fact that it would place our Atlantic ports from 377 to 579 miles farther within the Asiatic zone of competition with Europe than would the Panama route. In the sharp competition which we shall have from Europe in Asiatic markets this 500 miles more or less is important. How important may be realized from the fact that when China buys from the world's markets as much per head as does Japan now—about $3—she will buy products worth $1,200,000,000. Every mile saved in transportation will give us a larger share of the vast trade which the Orient is about to develop. If we have no canal at all, we shall have little share, comparatively, in Oriental commerce.

AN EMINENT ENGINEER'S OPINION.

I do not think that the case can be more concisely summed up than it is in a letter to me by the distinguished engineer of the Chicago drainage canal, Mr. Lyman J. Cooley, who not only has had more practical experience in canal construction than any American engineer, but who has critically examined both the Panama and Nicaragua routes. He writes:

> 1. As planned, I consider the Nicaragua Canal to be the safest. It has no tandem locks, the Conchuda Dam is less formidable than the one at Bohio, and the cuttings are less menacing on account of length and depth.
> 2. The estimates are more closely figured for Panama. The Commission in effect so states.
>
> 3. The actual cost (including purchase price) is more likely to exceed the estimates for Panama on account of health conditions. The work in Nicaragua can be done for the estimate by a syndicate on its own plans, as I have outlined in my testimony. What the cost will be under a different organization can not be judged until the programme and the men who are to execute it are known.
>
> 4 and 5. The water supply at Nicaragua can not be questioned. The discussion of the matter has arisen through an endeavor to regulate the lake level too closely. The supply provided at Panama is admitted to be inadequate for a large traffic, and is to be supplemented at a future time by a dam or dams in the upper Chagres basin. The water supply at Panama can probably be made sufficient for all future needs, though I am unable to say what would be the results of an extremely dry year. I do not regard the water supply for Panama as at all comparable to that for Nicaragua.
>
> 6. As designed, the Bohio Dam is not as safe as the Conchuda Dam. (See testimony as to dams.)
>
> 7. There is more money in the canal at Nicaragua for the contractor at the figures of the Commission. This would be especially true if the contractor can substitute an equivalent canal at Nicaragua; no material change can be made at Panama.
>
> You will note that I refer to an equivalent canal. I believe the eastern division at Nicaragua can be treated differently and thus facilitate construction, shorten time of passage, and reduce the cost of operation and maintenance.
>
> Aside from technical questions, I believe that the Nicaragua route is greatly superior, for the following reasons:
>
> 1. It is much shorter to 75 to 90 per cent of the trade in which we are interested.
>
> 2. The healthfulness is greatly superior, both for construction and for operation and maintenance.
> 3. The country has large natural resources, and is capable of inhabitation by white men, as much so as the Gulf coast of the United States.

4. Military security is insured by a population of our own citizens rather than by fleets and fortifications.

5. It is available for sailing ships, for which the Panama route is practically prohibitive.

6. It is most nearly an extension of our coast line, and no foreign nation can hereafter construct a canal within these limits, as they might if we built at Panama.

7. The Panama route is tainted by scandals and queered by failures, which make it a disheartening enterprise from engineering and contracting standpoint.

8. The Nicaragua route has been accepted and advocated on its merits for twenty-six years before the American people, and has always been admitted as superior for a lock, even by the Frenchmen prior to their failure.

9. It is a diplomatic mistake to now assume that the recent French project is really the meritorious plan and then proceed to force a distasteful bargain on the French shareholders and virtually the French people.

10. The dignity of the United States requires that it abide by the uniform determination of its engineers ever since the Commission of 1876.

I trust that the foregoing covers sufficiently the points which you have raised. You are at liberty to make such use of this letter as you may see fit in the interest of the common welfare.

THE VOLCANO QUESTION.

The only argument which at this time can, it seems to me, receive any consideration whatever, is that which makes use of the fear inspired by the recent volcanic disturbances at Martinique and St. Vincent. Those terrible manifestations of volcanic energy are used by the friends of the Panama route to excite the imagination to picture the destruction of Nicaragua. Attention is called to the fact that there are volcanoes in Nicaragua and Costa Rica, and it is therefore asserted that a canal located there would be liable to be overtaken by the fate which befell St. Pierre. They are dotted all over the maps here [indicating], showing us that at any moment the slumbering volcano may belch forth and destroy this canal if it is constructed. Those volcanoes have increased and come into active operation to an alarming extent within the past few months, while this canal bill has been under consideration, and calculated to excite the fear of those who have read of the frightful occurrences in the island of Martinique.

But attention is not called to the fact that the volcano nearest to the line of the canal is 16 miles distant, and that whatever destructive results might follow an eruption could be only through accompanying earthquakes. And this subject of earthquakes was exhaustively studied by the Isthmian Canal Commission, which, in its report, states that—

The entire Isthmus between North and South America (including Panama) is a volcanic region. * * * No portion is exempt from earthquake.

The Commission found for points on the line of the Nicaragua Canal a record of 14 earthquakes, only one of which, in 1844, caused serious injury. At that time Rivas, 4 miles from the canal line, was almost destroyed and damage was done at Greytown. The volcano nearest to the line of the canal is 16 miles from Rivas. The other volcanic cones vary from 40 to 200 miles distant.

THE HISTORY OF THE CITY OF RIVAS.

But, the Commission points out, Rivas has had a continuous existence since a period antedating the conquest. At Panama the Commission found a record of 28 earthquakes—twice as many as along the whole Nicaragua route. Of these, 12 occurred in the years 1882, 1883, and 1884. The most destructive one occurred in 1621, when Panama was destroyed. The next in severity was in 1882, when the front of the cathedral at Panama was thrown down, the canal headquarters building cracked, the track and roadbed of the railroad thrown out of line, and the masonry of three or four bridges and culverts damaged. At Las Cruces the church was thrown down; at Colon some lives were lost and crevasses were opened, while the Jamaica telegraph cable was broken. The Commission then goes on to say:

The effect of the undulations of the earth's surface upon any structure increases with the height of the structure above the ground. A force which would leave the foundation intact might throw down a high wall.

The works of the canal will nearly all of them be underground. Even the dams are low compared with the general surface of the country, and with their broad and massive foundations may be said to form part of the ground itself, as they are intended to do. The locks will all be founded upon rock. It does not seem probable that works of this kind are in any serious danger of destruction by earthquakes in a country where lofty churches of masonry have escaped with a few minor injuries.

It is possible and even probable that the more accurately fitting portions of the canal, such as the lock gates, may at times be distorted by earthquakes, and some inconvenience may result therefrom. That contingency may be classed with the accidental collision of ships with the gates and is to be provided for in the same way, by duplicate gates.

It is possible also that a fissure might open which would drain the canal, and if it remained open might destroy it. This possibility should not be erected by the fancy into a threatening danger. If a timorous imagination is to be the guide, no great work can be undertaken anywhere. This risk may be classed with that of a great conflagration in a city like that of Chicago, in 1871, or Boston, in 1872.

It is the opinion of the Commission that such danger as exists from earthquakes is essentially the same for both the Nicaragua and Panama routes, and that in neither case is it sufficient to prevent the construction of the canal.

On this point Professor Haupt, in his testimony before the Senate committee, said:

As to the question of seismic disturbances I would only add that it has been shown by students of seismology that the presence of active volcanoes act as a safety valve for internal disturbances, and the number of craters along through Nicaragua and Costa Rica being quite large, it affords a vent for any internal stress of the earth, and therefore there are fewer injurious earthquakes in that section of the world than at Panama or elsewhere, and I was very much surprised, in studying that subject, to find that the percentage of earthquakes was lower in Nicaragua than in almost any other portion of the world. Now, we have had some earthquakes in this country recently, one in St. Louis and one in Oregon, and many in California, so that, so far as that goes, it shows that there need be little anticipation of trouble from that source.

A SCIENTIST'S EVIDENCE AS TO SEISMIC DISTURBANCES.

Prof. H. Pittier, a resident of Costa Rica, who has given the subject most careful study, made a report to the United States Canal Board in 1895 concerning earthquakes in Costa Rica and Nicaragua, in which he says:

Although the whole of the main mountain range which runs from the shores of the lake of Nicaragua to the southern boundary of Costa Rica is probably of igneous origin, it may be asserted that the volcanic phenomena are in their latest period of activity, as seems to be generally the case all throughout Central America. Instead of the 20 volcanoes given for Costa Rica by Montessus de Ballore in his work, Tremblements de terre et éruptions volcaniques au Centrale-Amérique (Dijon, Eugène Tobard, 1888), there are in reality only four peaks or small mountain groups still showing signs of activity, viz, Miravalles, Poas, Irazú, and Turialba. There is not a single active crater south of a line going along the railway and main road from Limon to Puntarenas. I do not know of any record of an eruption of the Miravalles since the times prior to the conquista. The Poas is a geyser subject to great variations in the intensity of its manifestations. The last eruption of Irazú, which took place in 1888–89, was altogether insignificant.

Turialba is probably the most recent and most lively of our fire mountains. From May, 1864, to the end of February, 1866, it kept throwing at intervals an enormous amount of cinders or volcanic sand, which was carried as far as the Pacific coast by the trade wind. When I visited Turialba, in 1879, I only found a large chimney opened in the wall of an old crater, and through which escaped continuously a hissing column of sulphurous steam. But all through the surrounding region there were scattered evidences of far more active phenomena.

Since the foundation of our meteorological observatory good series of seismic observations have been taken at San Jose, and it is well to note here that, according to them, most of the shocks seem to be propagated in an undulatory way and in such a direction as to allow it to be supposed that they derive their origin in the volcanoes of Poas and Irazú. However, in the actual state of our knowledge concerning the Costa Rican seismology, it would not be prudent to draw any positive conclusion as to that point.

As to the geological age of our volcanoes it can be asserted that the more ancient among them are posterior to the middle of the secondary period and that their greater activity took place posterior to the Pliocene epoch. * * *

I took every pains to find an instance of shocks having been felt at Limon or in the settlements along the Sarapiqui and San Carlos rivers during that period, but persons of sound judgment and perfect honesty, most of them foreigners, who lived for years in those places could not refer to even a single case. Therefore, I consider it a safe conclusion to say that these seismic disturbances were almost invariably limited to the Cordillera and its immediate vicinity. * * *

Considered by themselves only earthquakes can not, in my opinion, be taken as a serious obstacle to the building of canals or railways in these countries. But it is not so when they occur in connection with the copious rains which characterize our climate. In itself the rain is a dangerous element, which penetrates the soil, loosens the clay or argillaceous strata, and very often produces considerable landslides. The soil may be soaked with water without giving way, but a sudden seismic shock can easily bring on a catastrophe. However, the general topography of the zone crossed by the western division of the canal, as far as my knowledge of the region allows me to state, does not seem to admit the possibility of easy movements of the superficial strata, and, moreover, the rain is much less in the Isthmus between Lake Nicaragua and the Pacific Ocean than on the eastern slope, as may easily be seen in the last paper of Professor Harrington on Central American Rainfall.

NO GROUND FOR CHOICE.

The recent report that there has been, within a few months, activity of Nicaraguan volcanoes and destruction of property by earthquakes at the upper end of Lake Managua, of which great use has been made by the friends of the Panama route, proves to have been without the slightest foundation. President Zelaya, of Nicaragua, telegraphed, under date of June 1, to Minister Luis F. Corea that "the news published about recent eruptions of volcanoes and earthquakes in Nicaragua are entirely false." And letters from United States Minister Merry, at San Jose de Costa Rica, recently received, state that there have been no earthquake shocks whatever along the line of the Nicaragua route for the past two months, while there have been several along the line of the Panama Canal. This information is confirmatory of the observations of the Isthmian Canal Commission, that earthquakes are more frequent at Panama than in Nicaragua. That danger from seismic disturbances are no greater at Nicaragua than at Panama may, I submit, be accepted as proved, as far as it is possible to bring proof to bear upon this subject.

The Commission is decided in its opinion that there is no choice between the two routes on account of danger from earthquakes, which, should they occur, would, in its opinion, be likely to inflict little if any damage to a canal. And this view of the matter is strengthened, rather than weakened, by the experience of Martinique and St. Vincent, where a canal situated 16 miles from Mount Pelee or La Souffrière would have met with no serious injury, if, indeed, it received any. Direct injury from an eruption, such as was occasioned at St. Pierre, which is only a few miles distant from the summit of Mount Pelee, is impossible at any point on the line of the Nicaragua Canal, for, as before stated, the nearest volcano is at least 16 miles away. Martinique and St. Vincent leave the canal question just where it was before. There is, therefore, no valid reason for the Commission to change its views on this subject. Whatever danger there might be to a canal in either location is from an earthquake, and, in the opinion of the Commission, there is in this respect no choice in routes.

THE FRAUDULENT CHARACTER OF THE PANAMA SCHEME.

The Panama scheme was conceived in fraud, and fraud has marked every succeeding step in its development. Should the United States, through misguided action of Congress, purchase what remains of an enterprise which has been a financial and moral curse to France, it will be found that the people of this country have been the latest victims of a swindle of gigantic proportions, whose inception preceded the famous International Canal Congress held in Paris in 1879. I think it is important at this time to go back to the beginning and to show what were the first moves in this great financial game.

After the completion of the Suez Canal its success caused French enthusiasts to turn their attention to that other great need of commerce—a canal to join the Atlantic and Pacific. All schemes proposed were submitted to De Lesseps, and all were encouraged. But it was not until men with prominent names came forward that he gave his sympathy and cooperation. Who these men were, why they proposed the scheme, and how it was adopted by the Paris congress is thus told in a report made in 1880 by W. E. Johnston, delegate of the American Geographical Society to that congress:

These men were Messrs. Wyse, Turr, and Bixio. Lieutenant Wyse, of the French navy, is a son of a former English minister at Athens, and his mother was a Princess Bonaparte, of the Roman branch of the family. General Turr is a Hungarian, and married Lieutenant Wyse's second sister. M. Bixio was a brother of the Minister Bixio of the provisional government of 1848. He died of fever on the Isthmus.

These gentlemen, backed by some bankers and personal friends, made their first visit to the Isthmus three years ago and examined one of the Atrato routes. They came back sick, reported unfavorably, and after some months' consultation, in which M. de Lesseps took a large part, it was decided that Lieutenant Wyse should return to the Isthmus and look at the Panama route, with the view of making that the affair on which they were finally to settle and as the affair to which the public in France would be most likely to subscribe.

The survey was made—how imperfectly was afterwards shown in the congress by the abandonment of all the figures, and of even the plan—the party returned to Paris, and last winter the plan of campaign of putting through the Wyse scheme was organized.

An international congress was to be called, so as to give authority to the scheme; M. de Lesseps was to preside at the congress and issue the invitations, and as the President had the right to constitute the congress as he saw fit, enough French members of the right sort were invited to counterbalance any opposition that might manifest itself. So far as Lieutenant Wyse and party were concerned, they sought first to reimburse themselves for the losses already sustained and for which they were responsible to certain bankers and friends, and this they hoped to do by forming a new company which would assume the responsibilities they had incurred.

This was the origin of the famous congress. It was not, as you see, a very high-toned affair; it was not intended that it should be. The object was to get out of an old debt by creating a new one, to be shouldered by some one else. The digging of a Panama canal was a very distant and very problematic affair.

But it turned out that the congress became a very serious and very grave affair. As eminent engineers from foreign countries began to arrive the hope of carrying out the prepared programme diminished. The great satisfaction which was at first manifested at the prospect of having a large and respectable gathering soon gave place to sad reflections and sad surmises. The arrival of the two eminent American authorities, Messrs. Ammen and Menocal, was a death blow to their hopes, and although those two gentlemen were treated with the greatest consideration, it was felt by the leaders that their coming was a disaster and that a new base of operations would have to be adopted.

There is nothing, in fact, more curious in the history of caucuses than the evolutions of this congress.

Not only was the president of the congress named in advance, but so also were the officers and the committees, and even the work the committees were to perform. Nothing, it was intended, was to be left to hazard. At the first meeting, at which were present the 136 members and above 300 spectators interested in the subject, nothing was done or allowed to be done but the reading of the names of the members, the names of the committees and their presidents, and an indication of the work they were to do.

The first meeting did not last an hour. No one had a word to say but the president and secretary, and this very summary way of treating the distinguished guests who had come a long way to the "study" of the interoceanic canal project was climaxed at the end by the president hastily adjourning the meeting with the remark: "Gentlemen, we are going to rush this thing à l'Américaine; we shall get through by next Tuesday."

Thus not only was the congress packed and manipulated so as to run through hastily and without fail the imperfect and impossible scheme of Lieutenant Wyse, but the most distinguished and honorable experts from all parts of the world were invited to give the scheme their aid and to cover it with their responsibility.

It was hardly dignified, therefore, for men holding the high rank of government delegates to take their seat in a congress which had been gotten up for a certain limited and well-defined object, and in which no proposition outside the programme stood the least chance of adoption.

THE CANAL CONGRESS OF 1879.

Mr. Johnston then states that the facts and figures given by Admiral Ammen and Mr. Menocal were a revelation to the congress, which was thereupon compelled to take some serious consideration of the question. During the discussion which followed, one of the delegates, M. Spement, declared that if De Lesseps's plan of a sea-level canal was impossible, "we must go to Nicaragua." Mr. Johnston then continues:

We were now brought face to face with the singular spectacle of a congress which had become serious and honest, and which saw its way clear to the truth, and yet which was obliged to remain dishonest and carry out the original plan, no matter by what means.

The reason of this singular anomaly is easily understood. M. de Lesseps, Lieutenant Wyse, and the bankers behind them, were pledged to the Panama route, and could not adopt another. That was the French route. They had been long manufacturing enthusiasm for that route. The bankers and the public would not give a cent to any route that was not patronized by M. de Lesseps and Lieutenant Wyse. So that to abandon that route was to abandon entirely for France the glory of cutting the interoceanic canal, and that was not to be thought of for a moment.

They have been claiming, as I have already told you, for years the monopoly of this question; they claimed all the knowledge on the subject, and to back out now would be to lose all the money they had engaged in the scheme, all the money they expected to gain, which was a mountain, and to lose their popularity besides. The congress would have been dissolved without a decision rather than to have adopted another than the French route.

But how was this accomplished? M. de Lesseps's galloping congress was adjourned for several days; we heard no more of rushing the thing through à la Américaine; they had to stop to change their base. Lieutenant Wyse, with such of the engineers as were pledged to this scheme, went to work in secret committee and labored night and day till they elaborated a new plan to cover, as they thought, the objections of Mr. Menocal, and with, of course, a much higher figure of costs. The committee having in charge the estimates on the probable receipts and expenditures of the canal were instructed by the president to try and make the receipts cover the new estimate of costs, which they did with the greatest ease.

Again the American engineers, backed this time by overwhelming arguments of Sir John Hawkshaw, showed that the plan was still defective; and again the congress was adjourned to give time to the Wyse secret committee to get up new figures and a new plan. The congress, which started off on a gallop, had first dropped into a trot, and was now at a walk. And all to allow Lieutenant Wyse to prepare estimates on difficult details which he had never studied on the ground, and which, therefore, were only theoretical.

The majority of the engineers lost their interest in the proceedings from this moment, and became simple lookers-on, while the meeting relapsed back into its original character of a congress for the benefit of Lieutenant Wyse and his party.

The assembly was now in a crisis. On the one side were the engineers; on the other the business men and the spectators. It looked at one time as if the Congress if called upon would have voted for the plan of Mr. Menocal by Nicaragua. The charter of Mr. Wyse from the Colombian Government exacts the building of the canal by the most economical route, and to build it by the dearest route is a violation and a forfeiture of the charter. But these difficulties, which were pointed out to the Congress, no longer stopped the proceedings. The Wyse party had now offered their ultimatum, which was an open cut without locks and with deversoirs, or side canals, the whole to cost $250,000,000 and to pay in receipts $18,000,000 a year. At this point M. de Lesseps made a long speech. * * *

The effect of this speech was enormous. The American engineers had shown that the Panama route, principally on account of the annual fall of 12 feet of rain, was impossible; that it never could be finished if commenced, nor made to pay a dividend if finished. It was all to no purpose. Lieutenant Wyse and his committee had but to retire to their consultation room to find at once in their own heads the figures necessary to head off Mr. Menocal's estimates. It was the game of "I see you and go you one better," played by men who had no cards, but plenty of money.

HOW THE BAIT WAS TAKEN.

Mr. SPOONER. What game is that?

Mr. PERKINS. This is the language of the representative from the Geographical and Geological Society at the convention in Paris. It is an enigma to me. I have a slight knowledge of French. His report is made in English. The explanation of the game of cards I leave to some one who has made a study of that branch of science, of which Mr. Johnston was evidently an expert.

Mr. Johnston then describes the plan of voting by which measures were taken to secure a decision in favor of the scheme. The result of this vote was 74 ayes to 62 nays and refusals to vote, out of a total of 136 registered delegates. Commenting on this, Mr. Johnston says:

An analysis of the final vote will show that the able engineers who came to the congress with their minds free from prejudice and with a desire to arrive at the truth are either to be found among the absentees or among those who abstained from voting.

Thus, as the majority for the Wyse scheme was small, as the neutral experts were opposed to it, and as the congress from beginning to end was manipulated in the interest of that scheme, it may be said that, in an international point of view, the decision of the congress was no decision at all and that it is without force and not binding.

A SCHEME TO PAY PRIVATE DEBTS.

Thus was this vast undertaking inaugurated for the purpose of enabling several prominent Frenchmen to pay their debts to French bankers. Its result is well known. A company was organized, and realized from the sale of stocks and bonds $260,000,000. The items of receipt and expenditure, now a matter of court record, show that there was actually expended by the old company on the Isthmus $156,400,000.

But after the expenditure of this vast sum on the Isthmus itself, and the dissipation of $100,000,000 more in various ways with which the promoters of the scheme were doubtless well satisfied, it was found that the actual work of constructing a canal had only really begun.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. McCOMAS. Was that 156,000,000 francs or dollars?

Mr. PERKINS. I reduced it to dollars, as we are more familiar with dollars, although all know the commercial value of the French franc. When, therefore, more money was needed, it was not forthcoming, and the company had to go into insolvency. This ended the first step in this stupendous scheme.

A NEW PHASE OF THE SCHEME.

But there were 600,000 or more Frenchmen who had contributed the vast sums that had so rapidly disappeared, and a clamor arose. The only thing to do was to form a new company, raise more money, and, if possible, complete the work. A new company was formed, to which the receiver of the old company, on its behalf, was a party, subscribing thereto, as did also, under compulsion, a considerable number of persons who were charged with having secured in a manner not too honest a considerable part of the $260,000,000 contributed by the French people, who were to have 60 per cent of the net profits of the canal. The sum of $13,000,000 in cash was secured by the new company, principally from those who had been charged with swindling the old one, and work was again begun on the Isthmus in accordance with new plans based on fresh surveys and examination of the ground. With the new company a new survey of the route became necessary, as it had been developed that practically nothing was known of the engineering difficulties.

A technical commission was appointed, composed of the most eminent engineers of Europe and the United States. The sea-level plan was at once abandoned, and surveys made for a canal with locks. It is reasonable to suppose, in view of the exigencies of the case and the absolute necessity for a report assuring construction at a not exorbitant cost, that the difficulties were minimized to the limit of safety under the need of a low cost of construction to induce subscriptions to the enterprise. It is these surveys which our own commission has practically adopted, with the exception of the Bohio Dam, in which case it has made plans which far exceed the limits of safety imposed by the technical commission. For the data obtained under such conditions, I will say parenthetically, the commission advises the United States to pay $2,000,000. But the difficulties developed proved to be so great that no more funds could be raised, and work had to be stopped. There was here a loss to the subscribers of questionable financial reputation and to bankers who backed them, and it became a question as to how to recoup themselves.

THE UNITED STATES TO BE DRAGGED IN.

Nothing having a chance of success presented itself, except a sale of the whole unsavory mess to the United States. No other scheme has been proposed; no other plan could be devised whereby they could recoup themselves from a financial point of view, except selling this gigantic fraud to the United States. We all know how their offer was reduced from $109,000,000 to $40,000,000, and how, in order to secure the latter sum, the rights of the hundreds of thousands of Frenchmen who originally contributed, were sacrificed as far as an expression of willingness to do so can effect that result—not an expression by the people themselves who had put their money into it and who have subscribed to the stock, but by their trusted agents who were engineering the scheme. If the scheme proposed be successful, the suspected swindlers of the old company will get back the money they were compelled to subscribe to the new, and the United States will be brought face to face with half a million or so of Frenchmen who clearly have some rights in the matter, with an undertaking on our hands to complete for $144,000,000 a work on which the actual expenditure of more than $156,000,000 has made but a good beginning. This is the Panama scheme, pure and simple, and it means just this: Adopt the Panama route, and, in my opinion, no isthmian canal will be constructed by the United States.

Mr. STEWART obtained the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCOMAS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. STEWART. I do.

Mr. MITCHELL. I suggest the absence of a quorum.
